PREFACE

WERE I to place on record here the names of all who have given me help in writing this book these few lines of preface would grow inordinately, but I cannot deny myself the pleasure of acknowledging that of the late Mrs. Edmond R. Wodehouse, in whose hands it would have been my dearest reward to place the finished work, and of Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, to whom my deep gratitude is due for valuable criticisms and suggestions.

For the translation of the Mantuan letters, etc., I have to thank Mr. J. M. Rigg, while Dr. Ludwig von Pastor and the late Dr. Bannister helped me greatly in procuring access to the Vatican and other libraries.

If the result of so many advantages helps any lover of sixteenth century a cappella music to a better understanding of the subject it will not have been in vain.

INTRODUCTION

IT is a characteristic attitude of the human mind to suppose that what is removed from the actual generation by some few centuries is necessarily either primitive, childish, or antiquated. To the student the fallacy of such a point of view is at once apparent, and he discovers that neglect and disuse are often the result of changed ideals and customs. The unaccompanied polyphony of the sixteenth century is an instance of this indifference to bygone things; a form of music so beautiful that it has never been surpassed, but sufficiently ancient for its construction to be generally misunderstood and its evolution forgotten. Yet, intended for a certain purpose, it has lost none of its old power; and this very noble and pure art contains a regenerating force which was never more needed than at the present time.

The explanation is a very simple one. Like some stream, flowing age-long through its deep-cut channel—to be diverted, later, by sluice or weir, into a fresh course—so did music follow a certain line of inspiration for centuries ; until it was forced by fresh conceptions of progress to accept other ideals, aims, and developments. These, in their turn, acquired new rules of theory and practice, the old formulas were superseded and forgotten, the ancient boundaries of the art misunderstood, and the individuality and sensitive inspiration necessary to its interpretation lost.

That it is still capable of retaining its old empire on the modern world is shown by the terms in which Richard Wagner refers to a performance of Palestrina's Stabat Mater as "an absolute spiritual revelation which filled us with unspeakable emotion"—one, indeed, finding its ultimate expression in the Grail music of Parsifal. After that it is hardly necessary to quote his opinion that Italian opera is "no legitimate daughter of this wonderful mother ;" yet it was this new form of musical art which superseded the old. It was, indeed, inevitable it should be so, for the Renaissance fostered the growth of personality, an idea fundamentally opposed to the selflessness and objectivity of the old polyphony.

The following brief review of the causes resulting in the phenomenon of a Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina is intended as an aid to those who wish to understand something of the history and evolution of this ancient music.

It was Plato who said: "The movement of sounds so as to reach the soul for the education of it in virtue we know not how, we call music"—a definition there would be no difficulty whatever in illustrating with the mass in B minor of Johann Sebastian Bach or Beethoven's ninth symphony. To what extent the music of 500 B.C. fulfilled so lofty an ideal there is no means of knowing, but it was probably no mere coincidence that this conception of the moral value of music survived the fall of paganism and formed the strength of its appeal to the primitive church.* Be that as it may, these Greco-Roman melodies were adapted to sacred words and thus became incorporated in the ritual. They were handed on orally, for all means of writing music down were forgotten in the general decay of learning. In time singing-schools were established, the authority of which was so well recognized that monks were sent from far distant lands to learn the authentic melodies—either the ancient, or new ones constructed on these models—but some hundreds of years passed before this position was reached.

It was a foregone conclusion that the Church would breathe her spirit into song derived from

* This material has been exposed and classified by F. A. Gevaert in his Melopée Antique, and is there shown to have been derived from the melodies sung and played by Greek artists who enjoyed a similar vogue in the last years of Ancient Rome to that of Italian operatic artists in the early nineteenth century.

pagan sources, and the singularly beautiful product known as plain-song was the result. This early flower of Christian art was as the illumination of a missal, for it had no significance without the text it enriched and beautified. Until the sixth century it was the only form of music tolerated in connection with the liturgy, after which period hymns attributed to St. Ambrose, St. Hilary, Prudentius, and others were admitted. Written about the fourth century, these were constructed on classical poetic metres, which, converted into regulated musical accents, may be regarded as the ancestors of our own time-system. On the contrary, plain-song is not rhythmical but follows the inflexion of the voice in the ceremonial reading of the Sacred Text. Though now subject to a less strict observance of ancient modes it has retained its place in church use.

On the evidence of the oldest surviving melodies* the Greco-Roman theories were held authoritative for many centuries. The system of construction can be identified with the eight forms of the Greek octave scale, and even as late as the ninth century the theorists revert again and again to the writings of the Greek philosophers, even if these were often misunderstood for the lack of pedagogic example. But in the tenth century writers on music waxed bolder and advanced new ideas, though the absence of musical notation seriously hampered their progress. Finally, it occurred to an enterprising musician that certain signs used to indicate accents in declaiming the scriptures might profitably be employed to show the upward or downward course of a melody. The signs to be converted to this use were termed neumes* and were "aids to memory"—a pictorial representation of the direction of sound by points and dashes first used in Byzantine liturgical books. Indication of actual pitch or duration was impossible, but the signs could, and did, enable a singer to recognize a melody, or to distinguish between two with similar openings; and—this possibility once established—the development of a musical notation was clearly only a matter of time. Such, indeed, became imperative when the composers conceived the idea of using two melodies simultaneously. Even in this very primitive form of part-singing something more definite than a point or a dash was required to keep singers together. They quarrelled over the interpretation of the neumes, it took years to commit the signs to memory—in short, musical art could scarcely have made further progress had it not been for a famous monk, Guido d'Arezzo.† Wearied by the labour of teaching his choir, he invented a system by which it was possible to learn to read at sight in a marvellously short time, and—as he quaintly put it—“clefs to unlock the secrets of the staves.” It is not certain that he invented the principle of the stave itself. Before his time a line was drawn through middle C as a definite point and pitch from which other notes could be reckoned ; but he certainly carried the idea much further, and used other clefs for the range of higher or lower voices. Guido died in 1050. Thus it had taken several hundreds of years to systematize what every child knows to-day, for until this point was reached everything was tentative, experimental, and fleeting.

* From neuma, a nod or wink.

† Now supposed to have been a native of France.

While theoretical principles were gradually built up, the early uncouth harmonies began to give place to other forms showing increasing resource and invention. For the first seven centuries the history of the Western development of music belongs to the South of Europe. Charlemagne's great love for and interest in the musical part of the Liturgy was the stimulus under which famous singing-schools spread over the rest of the continent, and now music tended to become international. First the Franks, then the English, after them the Netherlanders, bore the palm. Each influenced all, each carried the art a step further, each exhibited some national characteristic, differentiating its work from that of other nations. The circumstance of the Pope's residence at Avignon, at a time in which music was ardently cultivated at the University of Paris, had far-reaching results; for when the Papal Court returned to Rome it was accompanied by the choir of northern musicians which provided the Pontifical music in exile. These singers became incorporated in the Roman choir and brought with them the New Discant.

Some reference has already been made to the practice of putting two melodies together. One still earlier was to double the melody at a different pitch, with the result that a rude form of harmony was obtained in consecutive fourths and fifths. This so-called Organum now ceased to please, and by slow degrees a new form of composition was evolved, a union of two independent melodies, at first joined arbitrarily but gradually acquiring beauty and freedom. Such was the New Discant which the Pope's Avignon choir took with it to Rome.

It was a product born of many nationalities. The French brought innovation and daring, the English charm, expressiveness, and clarity of sound, the Netherlands subtlety and growth. Taking into consideration the well-known conservatism of the Church, it must be considered as a most important event in the history of music that this infusion of new ideas preserved the continuity of the Roman influence and so paved the way for the florescence of the great Roman School.

The ascendancy of foreigners in the Pontifical Choir continued until the latter half of the sixteenth century. All the great names of the Netherlandish School are to be found in its annals, either as singers or composers, for the fame of this body of singers drew every ambitious musician. Music was on truly international ground in Rome, and the art of composition now began to go forward with what seems, in comparison to preceding centuries, astonishing rapidity. To dwell more here on the individual points of development is impossible, though a bare mention of the device of canonic imitation, destined later to yield so rich a harvest, must at least be made. As musical devices grew in number composers tended more and more towards intense complications. Especially did Flemish composers display so great and joyous an ingenuity in note-values and time-measurements that it is little short of marvellous singers with the necessary patience could be found to unravel them. But if the composers occasionally forgot that music is an art first and a science afterwards, they certainly put the finishing touches to the theoretical structure which the great masters of the sixteenth century were to turn to such glorious account.

There was, however, a forerunner whose work cannot be passed over in silence. This is the great Josquin des Près. The facts of his life cannot at present be ascertained with any certitude, but it is probable that he was in the Pontifical Choir during the reign of Innocent III.,* and that he was born in Hainault. He has been described as the first composer of genius, and he certainly conceived music as a living art, and not as a branch of mathematics. Dr. Burney devotes thirty-two pages of his celebrated history to Josquin, and sums him up as follows:—

“It will perhaps be thought that too much notice has been taken of this old composer and his works” (Burney writes about 1780), “but as he is the type of all Musical Excellence at the time at which he lived, the less need be said of his contemporaries, who, in general, appear to have been his imitators.” At Josquin’s hands music achieved a fully developed technique,† and was ready for the final development unaccompanied polyphony was to receive at the hands of Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina. Nevertheless this point had not been reached without much opposition

* Not under Sixtus IV. as previously supposed.

† For the student these devices may be rapidly enumerated as, I. A system of note-measurements. II. Musica ficta (the use of accidentals). III. Imitation and canon.

on the part of the Church. There was, indeed, an intermittent quarrel between the clergy and the musicians for a period of time running into centuries, from 1322 onwards — when Pope John XXII. denounced the fantastic compositions of the new school and complained that they obscured the sense of the sacred text. The musicians temporarily submitted, but towards the close of the fifteenth century the complaints were reiterated, and with reason, for the requirements of the Liturgy were overlooked in the triumph of the new technique, and the situation was aggravated by the vanity and incompetence of singers who exaggerated the new artistic devices. In the multiplication of voice-parts the sacred words were indistinguishable, and when the custom arose of employing secular melodies in the interweaving of the parts, the profane title of the song so employed was often that by which the mass was known, an obvious and just cause of offence to churchmen. At one time nothing less than the exclusion of music from the Church was in contemplation, but saner counsels prevailed, and indeed composers were not lacking who recognized the truth of the Church's indictment.

It was after one of these periodic outbursts that Pierluigi da Palestrina sprang to fame.* Any consideration of the life of this great man accentuates the fact that he was no meteoric appearance such as his zealous biographer Baini would have us believe, but the culminating point of musical inspiration in successive centuries. So much appears from the patient reconstruction of his life by later biographers who, put on the trace of such discoveries by Baini's monumental work,* unearthed documents and facts formerly regarded as lost beyond the possibility of finding. Although exception may be taken to some of Baini's conclusions, it is undoubtedly true that without his enthusiasm for the works of this great master it might have been impossible to distinguish truth from legend, by reason of the almost complete oblivion to which succeeding generations had consigned him. Even so, it is a common thing to find that those persons familiar with the biographies, for example, of Cimabue or Giotto have never heard of ~~Palestrina~~, yet ~~he~~ was a contemporary of some of the best-known masters of the late Renaissance period, and was born in the first quarter of the sixteenth century. There can therefore be no reasonable excuse for classing him with the illuminati of a forgotten age, or for the assumption that his art, universally admired in that marvellous epoch, may be dismissed as either primitive or immature. The unaccompanied polyphony of the sixteenth century is a finished product, to the making of which went many centuries of evolution ; a perfect means to the end in view which, in St. Augustine's words, was "prayer to God with song." The long connection of music with the Church bore fruit at last and lifted prayer higher than human language can soar ; finding the right accents for pathos in supplication, jubilation in praise, sanctity in contemplation. In other words, that consummate mastery of the material was now obtained which had already found similar expression in painting and architecture. Of such was the great dome to the new church of St. Peter : its aspect there was power. Of such was the face of the Sistine Madonna : its aspect there was love, Divine Motherhood. The fulfilment of it in music was no less wonderful, but just because sound is transient, while the picture or building is (in comparison) intransient, great music can never make so final an appeal, or receive the same instantaneous recognition. Nor is this all ; music depends on a variety of outward circumstances before it can make any appeal at all, so that it cannot undergo the final test of property in the same degree as other arts, nor command the same consideration from the worldly-minded. So when, in the first decade of the seventeenth century, a new personal and dramatic element, with its attendant appanages of beauty of voice and form, floriture and ornament, made its appearance, the old impersonal elusive art—in its very essence, opposed to all that is implied in platform or footlights—was superseded and the course of music was changed. It became more human, less divine. It exchanged its quality of ecstatic contemplation of the heavenly mysteries for one expressing earthly joys and sorrows. In other words, Mary, sitting at her Master's feet, was replaced by Martha troubled about many things. Men now took from the old unaccompanied polyphony its underlying theoretical structure, but transformed it for the development of recitative and fixed tonality, and though, for many years still, compositions on the old lines continued to make their appearance, they were in the nature of atavistic phenomena. The great Roman School was dead.

CHAPTER I

THOSE who have visited the picturesque town of Palestrina will agree that in no other place in Italy is the great past more vividly recalled to the imagination. Built on a spur of the Sabine Hills, Praeneste, its ancient name, was "a place of cool and fragrant breezes," and for that reason a favourite refuge of the Romans in summer. Livy laments that its pleasures seduced senators from their duties on the Capitol, and Horace and Virgil sojourned there. It charms even now in its squalor and decay, for though sacked and besieged on more than one occasion, it still retains magnificent remains of pediment, plinth, and cornice, nor can anything rob it of its lovely setting in the chains of Sabine and Alban Hills, or of the flower-scented breezes from the adjacent campagna.

From its position the town was considered almost impregnable. It was further defended by fortifications, partly prehistoric, partly Latin, against which the forces of Rienzi hurled themselves in vain. It had not always been so fortunate. In a quarrel between Pope Boniface VIII. and its Colonna overlords Palestrina suffered almost total destruction, and its adjacent acres were strewn with salt so that no green thing should grow therein. Rebuilt in 1447, the town was again ravaged by Charles V.'s soldiery during that terrible time, the Sack of Rome (1527), and it may be that music ran an extreme danger, for, according to the most reliable evidence,* Giovanni Pierluigi Sante (generally known by the name of his birthplace as Palestrina) was then a tender infant. At a time when the high-born were reduced to begging their bread, it is possible that it was an advantage to be of mean estate; be this as it may, Providence shielded the Sante family, although, once more, the town was almost destroyed. Again Palestrina rose from its ashes, and to-day it is not unreasonable to suppose that the tortuous streets, picturesque town-gates and fountains, the water-carriers with their graceful copper-pots—even the shepherds in their long wide cloaks and high-crowned hats—can have changed little since this last upheaval, for they are all survivals of a mediæval past.

Tradition identifies a rough two-storied

* The register of his birth has not been found.

structure as the home of the great musician's family. Built almost on the town wall, it is only separated from it at the back by a small garden. In front, an outside staircase leads to a loggia from which a once large room (now divided into four) with high open hearth is entered. Here the father, with his wife Maria Gismondi, lived, and here the boy Giovanni Pierluigi was born, probably towards the end of 1525.* There were two other sons, Silla and Bernardino, and a daughter, Palma. That their circumstances were not too narrow may be gathered from the fact that they possessed a house, vineyard, chestnut-grove, and other property, but beyond that, nothing is known of "Janetto's" childhood. It may be conjectured that he showed early signs of musical genius, and, for that reason, may have been placed in the choir of S. Agapito, there to acquire the knowledge of those liturgical melodies destined to shape his mind to its great end. But, whether climbing the steep streets to the overhanging Rocca,† listening, as he went, to the stornelli sung by the peasants in the meadows below—those melodies of untold antiquity—or in the cathedral, following the hand-beat of the choir-master as he chanted the long alleluias on an Easter morning, it is certain that all musical sound was to him of deep significance, and that he was storing up impressions to be used hereafter for the greater good of his fellow-man.

Only twenty miles from Rome, Palestrina was thus near enough to permit of an occasional visit hither, and that the boy made the journey from time to time is certain. For the means of getting there, remained always the chance of a seat on horse-back behind a good-natured Colonna serving-man, or a place in the Bishop's train on his way to visit the Holy Father; and the boy would surely make his way to one of the great basilicas to hear a mass by Josquin, or Dufay, or Pierre de la Rue. There may even have been members of the family residing in Rome, though the only reference to any is to be found in a document discovered in recent years, the will of the grandmother, Jacobella, widow of yet another Pierluigi, dated October 22, 1527, the very year of the Sack. From the character of the goods she bequeathed to her descendants * it has been surmised that she kept an inn in the outskirts of Rome.

But the year 1918 has brought to light other documents which permit a much discussed question to be answered—who was Pierluigi's master? Tradition gave him a certain Gaudio

* In which are mentioned two daughters, two sons, and a daughter-in-law.

Mell, whom historians endeavoured to identify with the famous Huguenot musician, Goudimel, killed in the massacre of St. Bartholemew. It has, however, been proved that Goudimel was never in Rome. An ingenious attempt was then made to recognize Gaudio Mell in a certain Neapolitan musician, Cimello by name, whose pupils, in a dedicatory address, refer to him as learned in Flemish counterpoint,* but this, too, has to be relinquished by the discovery of what may be regarded as the truth. One legend,† for which any justification hitherto lacked, was to the effect that Janetto came often to Rome, and that, on one occasion, passing the great church of S. Maria Maggiore, singing as he went, he was heard by the choirmaster of that basilica, who, struck by the beauty of the childish voice as well as by the manner of singing, took possession of the prize for his choir. This story it is which receives some degree of confirmation from the facts recently discovered.‡ According to various entries in the Chapter archives of S. Maria Maggiore, it now appears that Joannes de pelestrina (sic) was among the six choir boys mentioned there on the date 1537, and that, in the charge of one of the chaplains, Giacomo Coppola, these were instructed in music by the choir-master. Further investigations revealed that Rubino filled that office until April 24, 1539, after which time the records are not clear. A certain Roberto is mentioned (of whom at present nothing is known), and not until December 6, 1540, does a name occur in the archives which may be taken as that of Pierluigi's master. This is Firmin le Bel, first referred to in the record as Chaplain of S. Bernardino and, on the 9th of the same month, as choirmaster.

If then Pierluigi was between eleven and twelve in 1537, he had over three years before him, after which his voice would no longer be available. It may therefore be taken that he was in the choir of S. Maria Maggiore until the end of the year 1541, the last year of his stay there coinciding with Firmin le Bel's first year of office. As is pointed out by the fortunate discoverer of these documents, the boy's best years of study were precisely those in which he came under the influence of the Frenchman.

But though these records are now silent, those of the town of Palestrina are not. An entry was found some years ago,* to the effect that, "towards this year (1540) one of our fellow-citizens, by name Giovanni Pierluigi, went to Rome to study music." The supposition is fair that his townsmen had awakened to the fact that great things were to be expected of Giovanni Pierluigi—otherwise his absence would hardly have been considered a matter of public interest. The point, however, of importance here is, did Pierluigi continue his studies with Firmin le Bel? There may still be an answer to that question, but at present there is none. Be this as it may, Firmin le Bel became maestro di cappella in S. Luigi de' Francesi, climbing to the altitude of the Pontifical Choir on September 4, 1561.* In default then of absolute proof no more than a mere surmise is possible that during the absence referred to by the town archives the brilliant young fellow-citizen continued to study with Firmin le Bel.†

The next landmark in Pierluigi's life is fortunately less nebulous; there is, indeed, no doubt about it at all. This is his nomination to the cathedral of S. Agapito in his native town as organist and choir-master. The contract was signed on October 23, 1544, and the duties were defined as choirmaster on all occasions, organist on festivals, and instructor of canons and boys. When this contract was first found there was some controversy whether it would not now be necessary to assume the date of Pierluigi's birth as having occurred some years earlier, for the appointment of so young a man to a post of so much responsibility was not in accordance with the custom of the times. Possibly the reason for this departure from precedence is to be found in the annals already referred to. If Pierluigi's genius was already recognized by the town, there would be no hesitation in making an exception to the usual rule for one so likely to confer lustre on his native place—a point of view which receives abundant justification to-day.

* Two compositions of his are to be found in Codex 38 of the Sixtine Chapel.

† Maestro Casimiri's comment is so amusing, no apology is required for quoting it here: "Oh, che forse i posteri ebbero a confondere un Mel; e peggio ancora un Goudimel, o magari un Cimello, con Firmino le Bel? . . ."

The next few years were probably amongst the happiest of Pierluigi's life. If he had not already reached up to Fame, no jealousies embittered his life; if his income was small (his new appointment was remunerated at the rate of a canon's stipend), so were his wants, and he had no anxieties. Already a person of importance in his native town (he was not yet nineteen), he had ample time for further study, and was surrounded by relations and friends who would watch his career with affection and sympathy. Three years later he married the daughter of a well-to-do citizen Francesco de Goris, on June 12, 1547.

The personality of Lucretia, his wife, is never once thrown into strong relief, yet a tradition exists that the marriage was a very happy one.

The great musician was destined to live through much sorrow in later years, and it is good to know that in his home was one who would help him to find courage. It seems as if his wife's father must have died shortly afterwards, for Lucretia received her share of the inheritance in November of that year. It consisted of a house, tannery, vineyard, fields, and meadows; with Lucretia's consent, Pierluigi sold the tannery in the following year.

For four more years the young choir-master continued to fulfil his duties in Palestrina, where grandiose ruins, lovely landscapes with Soracte and the Sabine Hills in the distance, and the vicinity of Rome must surely have stimulated his expanding genius, and, if he chose to mount the rock at the back of the town, the dome of St. Peter's, the goal of his ambitions, would beckon to him across the wide campagna.

Then a thing happened the significance of which can only be understood if we go back a few years in the history of the town.

On October 5, 1543, Palestrina received a new Bishop, in the person of Cardinal Giammaria Ciochi del Monte, formerly Bishop of Pavia and Archbishop of Siponto. The son of a famous jurist, he was himself a man of great learning and artistic tastes. Obviously he had opportunities of observing the young musician on his visits to his episcopal seat, and of noticing his remarkable gifts. He may even have extended to him his kindly interest and patronage.

Great as his position was, it was destined to become greater still, and in a very unexpected manner. The death of Paul III. on November 10, 1549, brought about an unforeseen situation in the Papacy, for it occurred at a moment when the dominant Imperial and Farnese parties were at daggers drawn. The consequence was that, divided, they were too weak to carry the candidate agreeable to their policy, with the result that the weaker French party seized the favourable opportunity to elect their own candidate, although he had already been expressly vetoed by the Emperor, Charles V. This personage was no other than Giammaria Ciochi del Monte, who ascended the Papal throne as Julius III. on February 8, 1550.

Whether the ambitions of the young choir-master were aroused by this brilliant event in the history of the town, whether the late Bishop had divined his remarkable gifts and felt that he was worthy of great opportunities, for one or other of these reasons the unusual step was taken of annulling his life-appointment to the cathedral of S. Agapito, and in September, 1551, he received the office of Master of the Boys in the Julian Choir, St. Peter's.

CHAPTER II

IF the preceding events be duly weighed it will be seen that it is not too much to presume an interest in the young Pierluigi on the part of Julius, especially if the Pope's personal idiosyncrasies be considered. Of simple, almost uncouth manners, most kindly disposition, his well-known love of music was only second to his passion for jurisprudence. Though we possess no information on the subject, it may be surmised that Pierluigi had given proof of capacity and zeal in teaching the choir of S. Agapito, while his personality and genius marked him out for higher opportunities still. He had been trained at one of the most important centres of church-music in Rome, and in all probability the Pope saw in him a fit instrument for work he had very much at heart. This was the reconstruction of the Julian Choir, a foundation created by his predecessor, Julius II., and intended to fulfil a certain purpose dear to the hearts of the Romans, no other than the attempt to remedy the state of things brought about by the infusion of foreigners into the Pontifical or Sixtine Choir in 1377, and who remained paramount there ever since.

It is not difficult to understand that the preponderating number of Flemish, French, and Spanish musicians in the Pope's service hit the notoriously jealous Romans in a very tender place, namely, their vanity, and they made humble protests. Julius II. admitted their legitimate ground for discontent, and partly in order to remove it, partly to create a convenient training-school, founded the Julian Choir. This supplied the services of the Basilica, and, at the same time, trained boys in the traditions of the Pontifical Choir, which celebrated body did not necessarily sing in the offices of St. Peter, but was attached to the Papal Court for the immediate service of the Pontiff, being in attendance at all religious functions and ceremonies at which the Holy Father himself was present, and accompanying him on his State journeys through his dominions. It was, in short, as much an adjunct of the Pontifical pomp as the Papal Chamberlains, or the Gentlemen of the Guard.

In the creation of the Julian Choir nothing drastic was undertaken. Its effect was intended to be entirely gradual. By 1526 there was a list of sixteen singers on its books, and its charter was consolidated by Paul III. ; in 1534 a gymnasium or school was attached in accordance with the will of Julius II., who left funds for masters in musica et cantû et in grammatica. A year later, the proportion of native singers in the Pontifical Choir had risen to seven in twenty-two. Not before the close of the century, however, was its purpose fully effected, when no foreigners remained in the Pontifical Choir.

It seems probable then that it was the Pope's personal wish that the choir-master of his former cathedral should be offered the post of magister in musica et cantû in an institution to which he attached so great an importance. The first notice to that effect in the archives of the Cappella Giulia is dated November, 1551, Pier-luigi is referred to as Magister Joannes, and three boys are assigned to his charge.

The change from the little country-town to the capital of the world with its brilliant life of the late Renaissance was as twilight to sunlight. The lustre of the present period is too well known to need insistence here, but it may be recalled that the works of Raphael, Michelangelo, Cellini, with a host of lesser names, in all their fresh colours, marbles, and metals, adorned the churches and palaces; that, everywhere, wonderful new buildings, in sharp contrast to the narrow filthy streets of mediæval Rome; such piles as the Farnese and Farnesina palaces; the new wide access to the Capitoline Hill with its flanking palaces designed by Michelangelo; the Via Giulia, due to the wealth of the Florentine magnates; and—most wonderful of all—the great mass of new St. Peter's, rising foot by foot to the south and west of the old basilica;—all created an atmosphere of power, growth, and beauty that could not but quicken and mature Pierluigi's genius. Times were changed, indeed, from those in which the little Janetto trembled at the master's frown in the choir-school of S. Maria Maggiore; when he, with others clustered round a great volume, must school his young shrill voice to the appointed entry in a difficult piece of counterpoint, or to the requisite length of a pause. Now he had become part and parcel of the great religious organization to which St. Peter's was head and front, must sign his goings and comings in its book, must take his share in responsibilities connected with its service. Anxiety, too, as well as pride, would be in his heart, for he must justify his appointment before a hundred jealous observers, and hold his own in an artistic world governed by foreigners of the greatest reputation.

In the eclectic group concentrated around the Papal throne all the elements existed helpful to the arts. Not, indeed, a Mæcenas such as Leo X., Julius possessed a social habit of mind and extended his patronage not only to music for ecclesiastical purposes, but to that intended for festive occasions from which he saw no reason to abstain. In the chronicle of his reign there is frequent reference to the Pope's presence at plays and banquets in which music is either mentioned or inferred, and it may very well be that the young magister's duties did not end with the church-functions or in the choir-school, and that his choristers' voices were occasionally employed in singing the famous madrigals of Arcadelt and Willaert before the Pope's guests. The merry or sentimental words would constitute no barrier to their performance before a Humanist Pope such as Julius III. was by education and inclination, who perceived no incongruity in assisting at the representation of a play by Plautus, or in patronizing an Aretino. Such influences were certainly valuable in ripening and mellowing Pierluigi's genius, trained, as it undoubtedly was, in all the erudition and crudities of the Netherlands school.

But the sun was setting on Rome of the Renaissance, with its social and political life in contradiction with the ideals of a pure Church. A growing spirit of discontent had already found expression in the long fight over the recent Papal elections,* and in every branch of society these ideas were steadily gaining ground. The discussions in the Council of Trent were the outward and visible signs of the doubt and distrust excited in men's minds by the prevailing laxity and irreligion. The need for reform was felt everywhere, even in music. The religious spirit did not here find adequate expression, and the requirements of the ritual were too lightly considered. The first breath of the new spirit was already to be found in the compositions of Costanzo Festa, whose death is recorded in the archives of the Pontifical Choir on the date April 10, 1545. His work shows some perception of the Josquinian theory that the sentiment was important and that a necessity existed of fitting the composition to the character of the words. Quite as remarkable was his recognition of the principle that the intelligibility of the words must not be lost in the weaving of the parts. It was a notable step in advance when music was seen to be far more than a mere embellishment to the ritual; to be nothing less than a form, and a very beautiful one, of prayer if conceived in that high spirit—a conception lost sight of when the ancient melodies gave place to the subtleties of a developing technique.

But there was yet another element in Roman music at this period. In the Pontifical Choir were many Spaniards in whose compositions an austere, idealistic tendency was to be found.

Morales, a contemporary of Festa's, was undoubtedly the greatest of these. A sentence of this grave, ascetic musician curiously recalls the old pagan philosopher's definition.* "Music," Morales asserted, "should be to educate the soul in strength and nobility," and here is the measure of the man's art.

Thus Pierluigi arrived in Rome at the psychological moment. The old ideals were changing, and dexterity and scholarship had revealed themselves as insufficient. But as yet there was no master-spirit to fuse the different elements into a perfect whole. Fresh to all these influences, Pierluigi showed later that he had been quick to grasp their significance. He was, of course, thoroughly acquainted with the two noble volumes of Morales's works, though the Spaniard had already quitted Rome before the younger master's arrival.

For three years the records of Pierluigi's Roman life are silent. It was certainly fully occupied. On the list of the Julian Choir were now sixteen singers, and the training of such a choir was no sinecure, involving infinitely more labour than that required in teaching the modern chorister. It may interest those unacquainted with the technique of the ancient music to learn what some of these difficulties were.

* See Introduction, p. xv.

Contrapuntal music was essentially a structure made up of many melodies. One of these, termed the cantus firmus, or firm-song, was assigned the chief place, and formed the frame around which the others were adjusted. While obeying strict laws in relation to the cantus firmus, within the limit of those laws the accompanying melodies may be said to have enjoyed equality, no voice taking precedence of another; a fundamental contrast to the modern harmonic system with its indispensable bass and treble. In illustration of this point some directions given by Pierluigi, on presenting a copy of a mass to the choir of S. Maria Maggiore, may be quoted here. He says that if it is not convenient to have the top-voice part sung this is of no consequence, the composition will still sound beautiful! Thus, each singer had necessarily to be self-dependent as there was no leader who might be relied upon at the beginning and ending of a melody, nor did the duration coincide. This was not the worst of it. The time-system of the day was a very pit for the unwary. A device at the beginning served to indicate the value of the division of the longest note, but even so, this varied according to position. As there were few bars, there were no strong and weak beats succeeding each other automatically at predetermined intervals, no definite pulsations according to a time-signature;

thus the singer must give close attention and possess an accurate knowledge of the elaborate system of time-values. The modern musician would regard the disadvantages of such a method as almost insuperable, but there were great compensations; an exquisite quality of smoothness, freedom from a foregone conclusion, and suggestion of soaring infinity, the ear never becoming satiated. Other difficulties with which the unhappy singer must contend included the necessity of translating canon at sight (i.e. of repeating a melody at the fourth, fifth, octave, or whatever the interval selected) according to strict but unwritten laws, being forced to fill up the part from his theoretical knowledge; he must learn, also, the compound divisions of time-measurements, so complicated that the most learned professor to-day might well hesitate before such a task. All this required unremitting labour on the master's part and a corresponding expenditure of time, for without accuracy and certainty, no singer could hope to hold his own in the single-stave parts which were all he had to sing from. In spite, however, of the work implied in training his sixteen singers, Pierluigi must have been deeply engaged in composition, though in this connection nothing appears before 1554 when his madrigal, "Con dolce altiero," was published by Gardano of Venice in a collection described on the title-page as Il quarto libro de Madrigali a quattro voci a note bianche. There was nothing unusual in this, for church musicians had long ceased to regard secular music as derogatory, and Costanzo Festa, with Willaert, the celebrated choir-master of St. Mark's in Venice, were excuse enough were any needed. Times were to change again, later on, and Pierluigi would think it necessary to express regret for his madrigals as follies of youth, but while Julius III. was on the Papal throne, he was sure of encouragement and praise. Indeed, it may be conjectured that this first fruit of his protégé's pen did not escape being sung in the presence of the Pontiff.

But, this same year, Pierluigi brought out a far more convincing proof of his quality, both as scholar and musician. This was the first book of masses, described by a modern historian as the most notable dedication which fell to the lot of Julius, for, as was only to be expected, Pierluigi inscribed them to his great patron.*

On the first page appears :—

*Joannis Petri | Loisij | Praenestini | in basilica | St. Petri
de urbe capellae Magistri Missarum Liber Primus* with the publishers' names: Valerio et Aloysio Dorico 1554. Four of the masses were for four voices, one for five. The dedication runs as follows :—

* Von Pastor, Geschichte der Päpste,

Julio Tertio. Pont. Max.

Jo. Petrus Loysius Praenestinus

Christianas summi Dei laudes exquisitioribus rithmis cum cecinissem paucis ante diebus ; nulli magis quam tuo nomini eas dicare visum est ; non eo solum nomine quod tu unus in terris proxime ad Deum accedis ; sed quod natura ita Musicae faves ; ut sperare mihi posse videar, non ingratum futurum si tuae Sanctitatis dignas aeterno praeconio laudes post Deum cantare aggrediar ; quod mihi diu facere ut contingat, non minus peto quam opto. Vale.

Which rendered freely into English is :—

“A few days ago, having set to music in a more exquisite manner these Christian praises to the most high God, no other name but yours seemed worthy of the dedication, not only because you alone are next to God on earth, but because you are so disposed by nature to encourage music, that I may hope that it will not be unacceptable to you if I sing your praise after that of God and that I may well be permitted this favour for a long time is both my wish and my prayer. Farewell.”

A quaint woodcut represents Pierluigi on his knees, offering a copy of his work to the Pontiff. Both the portraits are disappointing, for though it is well known that Julius' appearance was bluff and almost jovial, the features blunt and coarsely cut, these characteristics are here exaggerated and give no hint of the real culture behind. The musician's face is equally uncharacteristic ; it is indeed almost boorish, and without a trace of sensibility. But, if the portraits must be regarded as entirely inadequate, the dedication, at least, serves to give us a glimpse into Pierluigi's mind concerning his own work. "A more exquisite manner," he says, with pardonable pride. The technique is already there if the mastery which in a few years more would astonish the world is not yet full-blown. The tone is striking if it be considered that the words are those of a young composer offering his first important work to the head of Christendom. It indicates the power and conviction of genius.

— If the adulatory tone of the dedication offends, it should be remembered that thus was the custom of the times, and that such phrases were as the Court-suit of a subject about to enter the presence of his Sovereign.

Of Julius' reception of the momentous volume there is no record, but when we read that the striking of a fine medal in this reign was celebrated hilaritate publica—with public joy—it can hardly be doubted that Pierluigi's masses were duly fêted. He was, moreover, soon to receive a signal proof of the Pope's favour ; but of that later.

On opening the book the fact is at once patent that Pierluigi was steeped in the learning of the Netherlanders. The first mass, Ecce Sacerdos

Magnus contains examples of Mode, Time, and Prolation (as the different divisions of note-values were termed) which the school of Josquin itself might have envied, as well as instances of augmentation, and combinations of duple and triple rhythms such as only a close student of these matters can hope to elucidate. But the most curious feature of the whole, one which is not to be recognized without a smile, is the delicate compliment implied, not only in the title of the mass, but in the treatment of the theme to which the words are fitted. Pierluigi has at one and the same time seized the opportunity of praising the Church and the Pope, his patron, in such a masterly compound of learning and diplomacy that one hardly knows which to admire most, the courtier or the scholar. Through every voice-part, throughout each division of the mass, stalking through Kyrie, Credo, and Sanctus, Ecce Sacerdos Magnus continues its uninterrupted progress to a melody which suggests nothing so much as a folksong rung out on a carillon against the delicate tracery of a Gothic spire in Flanders. Could some fifteenth-century Fleming be re-embodied, on hearing this, he would surely stretch his arms and roll out the words with zest. But not if he heard the melody wound in the fibre of the mass itself. It would be as easy to find the proverbial needle in the haystack. For it may be compared to the warp on which the web is woven. It was the warp, the cantus firmus the "firm song" on which the changing melodies broke and receded like the waves over a hidden rock on the shore. This curious custom of employing an obviously secular melody in a composition for church use will be referred to at greater length, but, for the present, we will pass on, merely pausing to give the fine old melody as it stands.

It seems almost superfluous to point out that the homage before St. Peter's successor was a great deal more than an adroit flattery. There was inevitably a fastidious joy in the delicacy of the workmanship, in the envelope which contained the compliment. There is a suggestion here of the naïve self-congratulation displayed by Pierluigi's great contemporary, Benvenuto Cellini, on the completion of some object of beauty, conceived by his genius.

The other masses contained in this volume were O Regem Cæli, Virtute Magna, Gabriel Arcangelus—these for four voices—and Ad Cœnam agni providi for five. In all of these Pierluigi employs the same learned style and complication of device, but in Virtute Magna there are intricacies of complex proportion, i.e. subdivisions of time according to a duple and triple rhythm, which make it extremely probable that it would have remained sealed in recent times to all but the antiquary were it not for the elucidation given by the indefatigable editor, Dr. Haberl, of the collected edition of Pierluigi's works, who translated it into modern time-measurement. In spite, however, of the tremendous subtleties, there is a lightness of treatment, a freedom of melodic phrase such as no mere dry-as-dust pedant steeped in the accumulated learning of centuries would have achieved. If Pierluigi set himself the task of disarming criticism by a display of erudition calculated to dazzle his critics, he certainly succeeded ; simultaneously gathering up his strength for a fresh advance.

As far as is known, the Pontifical Choir, notoriously jealous of musicians outside its ranks, especially when of native origin, took no notice of these masses ; that they were performed by the Julian Choir was not only a foregone conclusion, but seems clear from an entry in its archives. There it is set forth that, in November, 1554, a payment was made to one Giovanni Belardino (sic) Pierluigi for the purchase of a first book of masses : this Giovanni Belardino was presumably Pierluigi's brother Bernardino who, in that case, must have followed his great brother to Rome.*

One of the results involved in the publication of these masses was certainly the wider recognition of the young composer's genius. He was now a marked man in the world of artists and cognoscenti, yet he did not for that reason neglect the daily routine of his work in St. Peter's, to which what may be regarded as indirect allusion is made in the account given by a travelling German of his visit to the Eternal City about this time in Holy Week, when he speaks of the great beauty of the services both in St. Peter and St. John Lateran. If only he had been more precise in his commendations and had informed us what were the masses he heard!

* See page 39, footnote.

CHAPTER III

IN January, 1555, Pierluigi became a member of the Pontifical Choir. The mandate was in the Pope's own handwriting. Thus, in the short space of four years, he reached a position coveted by the most renowned musicians of Europe.

The entry in the Choir records, made by the Puntatore, or registrar, is as follows :—

“Dominica 13 Jan fuit ad missus (sic) in nobum (sic) cantorem Joannes de palestrina de mandatu (sic) S mi D. Julii absque ulo (sic) examine et secundum motum proprium quod habebamus et absque consensu cantorum ingressus (sic) fuit.” *

That is to say, Pierluigi was admitted in accordance with the will of his all-powerful protector, without being subjected to an entrance examination ; moreover, the singers themselves had not voted in favour of his election. Though, on the face of it, it would seem that Pierluigi's claims were of the highest order, this autocratic act on the part of the Pope was against the usual custom and was sure, for that reason, to be secretly resented by the members of one of the most jealous and exclusive bodies in Europe. There were also actual disqualifications. Firstly, Pierluigi was a married man, although, according to the regulations, celibates only were eligible; secondly, there are reasons for believing that he possessed but an indifferent singing-voice; and lastly, it was usual for members of the Pontifical Choir to take ecclesiastical orders.

As Julius himself revised the rules of admittance to the Choir, he must necessarily have known very well what he was doing, and, indeed, there was a saving clause in the regulations which permitted him to make exceptions at his good pleasure. Thus he was justified in using his prerogative. Probably for that reason the Pontifical Choir dared to make no protest at the time, and Pierluigi certainly thought himself perfectly safe as this was a life-appointment. But his enemies were soon to have him at their mercy, for the Pope's days were numbered.

With shaken health, afflicted with gout, disheartened by a long series of untoward political circumstances which, being powerless to avert, he had even aggravated by a lack of statesmanship, of tact, and of self-command, Julius, for the last portion of his life, withdrew himself more and more from the cares of an office grown too heavy for him, and spent much of his time in directing the building operations of his new and exquisite villa outside the Porta del Popolo, hard by the Flaminian Way.* This was the so-called Villa di Papa Giulio, begun in 1551, and finished three years later. Designed by the famous Ticinese architect, Vignola, it was surrounded by gardens worthy of Eden.† Little wonder, then, that the Pope sought there a refuge from mental and physical ills. Who will doubt that he sent for his singers, or that many a lovely madrigal floated over the neighbouring heights of Monti Parioli in the cool of a summer evening?

But even these delights could not prolong the life of the Pope. A return of his old enemy, gout, for which an all too severe hunger-cure was prescribed, brought his life to an end on March 23, 1555, after a short reign of five years.

In the midst of the turmoil and confusion Pierluigi could have had but little time for gauging his personal loss. But scarcely was the Requiem Mass over with all its attendant ceremonies than his natural regret would be tempered with renewed expectation, the Conclave electing Cardinal Cervini as the succeeding Pontiff.‡ This personage had already attracted the attention and admiration of his contemporaries through the saintliness of his life, by his gifts and aspirations ; in particular, great hopes were placed on him by the party for reform. Without entering deeply into the political history of this time, it may be useful to recall that the recent loss of England to the Papacy was regarded by the devout as a punishment inflicted on the Church for its laxity and worldliness, and as a clear warning of what was in store if the handwriting on the wall were disregarded. Thus the election of Cardinal Cervini was significant of the impending change and, with the passing of Julius, the spirit of the Renaissance, the worship of art, beauty, and culture, definitely waned.

To those so deeply concerned for the spiritual welfare of the Church, the election of Marcello Cervini doubtless seemed a direct answer to prayer. Endowed with great gifts, imbued with a passionate sense of the necessity for the purification of the Church, his succession to the Papacy was as if a purer air swept over Rome. An indirect confirmation of this statement may be found in the diary of one who regarded the change from a worldly point of view, and in commenting on the reforming zeal of the new Pope, observes, "everything is sad, gloomy, and funereal." Though the need for a purer atmosphere may be conceded in theory, in practice it is often a painful process.*

In the midst of the most weighty affairs connected with a world-jurisdiction difficult, to-day, to imagine, Marcellus yet found time for a matter very close to his heart. On Good Friday, on his return from that wonderful service in which the Reproaches create so poignant an effect, the Pope required that his choir should be summoned to his presence, and exhorted them to be careful, in future, that the music chosen was suitable for days of penitence and mourning; also, that the words of the Mass were clearly distinguishable through the web of counterpoint which embroidered the plainsong. Something like this has been heard before, and will no doubt be heard again; but, in one respect, there is a remarkable advance to be noted. This may be said to be the first official recognition of Josquin's dictum, half a century earlier, that music must not only sound well, but mean something. Even the great Fleming, however, confined his discovery to setting the verse of a psalm in a motet, continuing to treat the Mass from a ceremonial point of view which took little account of the difference in religious emotion implied between a Kyrie eleison and a Gloria. The Pope, therefore, in making such a recommendation to his choir, was instituting a new standard in ecclesiastical music, and in so doing revealed himself as a musician of singular insight, insomuch that he insisted on the suitability of the music chosen for Good Friday.*

This was certainly no mere coincidence. A letter is in existence† which implies the Pope's interest in the purity of the chant as far back as 1546. A man of the widest cultivation, it may very well have struck him that music had not yet taken its rightful place in the service of the Sanctuary. Of all the Popes in whose reigns Pierluigi's life-course was destined to run, not one promised to work so beneficent an influence on music and musicians as this singularly attractive personality Marcellus II.

As a member of the Pontifical Choir Pierluigi accompanied his colleagues into the Pope's presence. Though, unfortunately, only the bare mention of what took place has survived, it may be surmised that the audience created a great impression on at least one member of the Pontifical Choir, for the seed then sown was destined to bear a world-famous fruit, the Mass of Pope Marcellus, linking for ever the names of Pope and musician.

But the Pope whose all-too-short reign

* Massarelli Angelo, Diarium Septimum : translated by Merkle, Freiburg by Breslau, 1911.

† A letter, discovered by M. Dejob, from Cardinal Sirleto to Cardinal Cervini, created so extraordinary a spirit of hope and energy, whose very life seemed indispensable to the well-being of the Church, was taken from his labours after three weeks, and Christendom was again without a head. In the midst of the ferment caused by this event the Sacred College once more met and just twenty-three days after the death of Marcellus a new Pontiff was elected, on May 23, 1555, a date Pierluigi was to have every reason for remembering.

Cardinal Pietro Caraffa, who now assumed the tiara as Paul IV., while possessed of the same zeal for reform as his predecessor, conceived it from a different point of view. For instance, where it might be assumed that any peculiar or undeserved hardship created by his efforts in the sacred cause of reform would be mitigated by a man of such scrupulous and idealistic temperament as the highly cultivated Marcellus II., Paul, whose association with the dreaded Office of the Inquisition was little likely to temper with benevolence the natural severity of an unbending character, looked neither to right nor left but abode by the strict letter of the law, no matter what unmerited punishment might fall upon his victim. His incessant cry was "Reform, reform," with which, moreover, the Church had every reason to occupy herself, and one of his first activities was connected with the revision of the various offices in the Vatican ; thus setting his own house in order.

It may be that the Pope did not arrive without assistance at the discovery that all was not as it should be in the Pontifical Choir. The Puntatore's absque consensu cantorum ingressus (sic) fuit was possibly not alone inscribed in the records but graven on the hearts of the members of the Choir, and jealousy—like wine—improves with age. Besides, Pierluigi, a Roman, bade fair to outshine them all in reputation ; therefore the Pope's passion for reform might here be turned to advantage. Whether this be so or no—and there is yet another theory that Pierluigi's madrigals had offended the rigid temper of the Pope—his attention was called to the undeniable fact that the official number of the Choir had been exceeded, that three of its members were married men, and that one of them had been enrolled in defiance of the statute that a strict examination of the candidate should be conducted by the members of the Choir. The fiat went forth on July 30, 1555 ; Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina, and with him Leonardo Barré and Domenico Ferrabosco,* was to be dismissed from the Choir forthwith.

Against the injustice of this high-handed proceeding there was no redress. Ferrabosco's case was particularly hard, as he had relinquished a fine appointment in S. Petronio, the great Bolognese cathedral, to enter the Pontifical Choir. As we have seen, Pierluigi was there in accordance with the Pope's motu proprio, by the will of Julius III. himself, who framed the regulation he chose to disregard. The only sign of consideration for these hard cases shown by Paul was the intimation that a pension of six scudi would be paid monthly to the banished members, or a sum equal to two-thirds of their stipends.

* A member of that family bidden to the English Court, who there made music for a generation or two.

The theory that madrigal-writing may have influenced the Pope's decision with regard to Pierluigi receives some support from the circumstance that both Ferrabosco and Barri were prolific writers of these things. Pierluigi, also, in this very year, published a collection of his own, though not a single copy of that edition has survived. There can be no doubt that to Paul IV. any connection between members of his own choir and compositions which set to music verse dealing with love and the beauty of women would appear to be little short of sacrilege, and some words which Pierluigi employs, later on, in a dedicatory address to Gregory XIII., lends colour to this view of the case. Be this as it may, Giovanni Animuccia, the Florentine whose history touches Pierluigi's at so many points, was installed in his place as member of the Pontifical Choir.

Pierluigi's situation was grave enough. He who had climbed the ladder of fame so rapidly now found himself again at the bottom. Without wishing to exaggerate the result of his dismissal it would surely be interpreted to his disadvantage. That Pierluigi himself so estimated his present circumstances seems evident, for the choir-attendance book of the Sistine chapel records Palestrina infirmus from July 18 to July 30, on which date he was dismissed. Nor was he present at the official reading of the motu proprio at the meeting of the Chapter. At the same time, serious as the position was to a young man with wife and family, he must have remembered that he was already famous, and that to such as he a good appointment would not long be lacking. Nor was he without resources. It is probable he returned to Palestrina, "the place of cool breezes," until summer was over, there to recover his health and consider new plans. But nothing definite is known of him until his appointment as choirmaster to St. John Lateran, dated October 1, 1551. Baini says he hesitated to accept the new post until he was sure he would not lose his pension from the Pope.

According to the most recent researches, it does not appear that Pierluigi was invited to become choirmaster of St. John Lateran by the Canons, as Baini says, but by the Archpriest, Cardinal Ranuccio Farnese. There had been some irregularities in connection with the choir, and the Chapter placed the whole matter in the hands of Cardinal Farnese to deal with as he thought best. Possibly for that reason, not a single entry referring to Palestrina's nomination has been found, although in the book of accounts for 1555 occurs the following: "To Ms. Joannes, master of the choir, for his salary in the present month of October, scudi 6."* Further confirmation of the new appointment is to be found in the quaint memorandum: "for making the cotta of ms. Jo: master of the choir, of the aforesaid cortinella (stuff) b. 80."†

The present building of St. John Lateran hardly represents the church with which Pierluigi was familiar. Sharing with St. Peter's the proud distinction of dating its foundation from Constantine, it was at this moment in the state in which it was left by the restorations carried out by Popes Martin V. and Eugenius IV., so that neither the principal façade nor the entrance to the north transept were in existence. The pillars, too, of the interior were differently ordered, and the walls adorned with frescoes by Gentile da Fabriano. There are two sketches by Martin van Heemskerck, a pupil of Jan van Scorel, who was in Rome from 1532 to 1535, which represent the church as Pierluigi knew it,* showing also the highly interesting remains of the old palace of the Laterani on the east side of the Basilica, once the residence of Constantine's wife, Fausta, and given by him to the Popes, who lived there until they migrated to Avignon. There was the Sancta Sanctorum, the small Italo-Gothic chapel of S. Lorenzo in Palatio, so-called on account of its most venerated relics which gave the entire precincts the sacro-sanct character expressed in the inscription over the door: Caput Urbis Orbis Mundi Patriarchale et Imperiale.

The choir of St. John Lateran had been recently enlarged by Paul III., and endowed by Cardinal de Cupis and was hardly of less reputation than that of St. Peter's. In spite of the temporary difficulties alluded to above, it seems to have been the custom there to bestow large gifts in money on the choirmaster and the choristers, an agreeable proceeding the Chapter wished, later on, to put a stop to. Pierluigi does not appear to have taught the boys, which gives rise to the supposition that he lived outside the precincts. The warrant for this point of view lies in the Chapter-accounts from October, 1555, until the end of December (after which date the books are lost), which give the information that not Pierluigi but a certain Bernardino, tenor,* governed and instructed the boys.

The strong inclination of the new Pope towards austerity and discipline soon affected the moral atmosphere of Rome. As a famous historian puts it : † “Now they began once more to intone their Confiteor and Credo,” inevitably turning Pierluigi’s thoughts more persistently in the direction of Church music.

These years in St. John Lateran yielded two compositions which secured his reputation. These are the Improperia or Reproaches of our Lord, and a set of Lamentations ‡ taken from the Book of Lamentations.

It is certainly a matter for regret that Pope Marcellus did not live to hear the most poignant Good Friday music ever written. Previously, both the Improperia and the Lamentations were chanted to a plain-song melody. Pierluigi, with his unerring instinct for apparent simplicity, the result of flawless technique, set them to a faux-bourdon or plain harmonization, of which the effect is unspeakably grand. Chanted during the ceremony of the Adoration of the Cross, it is difficult to suppose that these Reproaches could leave any hearer unmoved. Popule meus, quid feci tibi ? aut in quo contristavi te ? responde mihi.

* It has been suggested that this Bernardino was Pierluigi’s brother. Until the present there is no proof. Monsignore Casimiri thinks it may have been a certain Bernardino, fellow chorister with Pierluigi in S. Maria Maggiore in 1537. G. P. da P., Nuovi Documenti.

The story runs that when the fame of this beautiful work reached him, the Pope desired to hear it sung. One cannot doubt there was here some small degree of compensation for the humiliation of being dismissed from the Pontifical Choir.

CHAPTER IV

THE chief Roman event of the year 1559 was the passing of Paul IV. (August 13).

The Pope, whose hasty unbending character brought about some of the gravest crises the Church had yet encountered, was no more, the penitential season with its cleansing fires was to give place to a less exacting régime. Along with the rest of the Roman world, Pierluigi was probably braced and chastened by the rigours of a government which had nothing of the soft, luxurious Renaissance character. But the compositions belonging to this reign show in what spirit he had borne his disappointments and with what strength of character he set himself to repair his misfortunes. He had his personal reasons for regarding with anxiety any change in the Papacy; indeed, it is already obvious how much he had to gain or lose by the good disposition of the reigning Pontiff towards music and musicians, so it must not have been without a sense of satisfaction that he received the news of Cardinal Giovanni Angelo Medici's elevation to the chair of St. Peter as Pius IV., whose artistic tastes were well known and who was a warm patron of music, taking especial interest in the art of composition.*

To Pierluigi the practical and material side of his profession was of the utmost importance. It need hardly be said that the conditions of life in a small town like Palestrina and in the great city were absolutely different. In the Sabine Hills, a small settled income, vines, and olives, probably provided as many amenities as the circumstances required, but now the exigencies of an official position and a growing family pressed more heavily upon the composer. It has been made a subject of implied reproach that he was never indifferent to the financial aspect of a question, nor ever neglected an opportunity of attaching himself to a wealthy patron; but he should rather be praised for precisely those qualities which prove him to have been a good husband, careful father, and prudent man, qualities—all of them—by no means inseparable from genius. Moreover, it is fairly obvious that he could never have enriched the world with the extraordinarily large number of his compositions had he not possessed in a high degree the capacity for managing his affairs, and thereby securing the necessary environment of calm and comparative ease for intellectual labours. The honied phrases of his dedications were the usual custom,* and even in our own day not entirely unknown, and it has been wittily said that a powerful patron might be considered in the light of a policeman, by means of whom it was possible to redress one's private wrongs, and make headway against one's enemies. Possibly he was not altogether satisfied with the financial conditions of his new post, in spite of the four barrels of wine which, according to the accounts, he sold to the authorities of St. John Lateran in July, 1559, for eight golden scudi ! † At all events, whatever the reason, after five years of office he left St. John Lateran so hurriedly that the secretary to the Chapter thinks it right to emphasise the speed of his departure. ‡ This curiously worded document, so recently discovered, § runs as follows :—

The date of this is August 3, 1560, and it is preceded by two others, dated respectively July 20 and 27, which may, or may not, throw some light on Pierluigi's hasty departure, for they refer to economies in the management of the choir. The great musician shows here some evidence of an embittered and irritable state of mind. Even if not prepared to accept the new financial conditions, it hardly seems in keeping with his customary prudence to throw up such a position with no other in prospect, and it is possible that there was some other motive behind. Still neither the Chapter nor Pierluigi appear to have nourished a permanent grievance in the matter, as will be seen later.

The intervening six months before Pierluigi returned to the church in which he had been a chorister twenty-four years earlier, are in our present state of knowledge a blank. It can only be guessed that much of the time was given to certain glorious compositions which were shortly to make their appearance. The Chapter decree above refers to Pierluigi's son,* already a chorister, and about ten years old at this time. Later evidence will show that he with his brothers was carefully trained in counterpoint and the playing of various instruments, and Pierluigi may have devoted this interregnum to his family.

In the Atti Capitolari of S. Maria Maggiore against the date March 1, 1561, is to be read the ratification of Pierluigi's appointment to the Basilica Liberiana (S. Maria Maggiore).* His connection with it as choirmaster was destined to coincide with a very brilliant period of his life. The pleasant fancy may perhaps be permitted that his genius was spurred to fresh exertions by the classic beauty of his environment. One of the oldest in that city of old churches, S. Maria Maggiore took high rank as one of the four patriarchal churches, the other three being St. Peter's, St. John Lateran, and St. Paul Outside the Walls, all of them churches within whose parochial boundaries the whole of the human race is included. In other words, their parishioners consisted of the faithful irrespective of nationality. The miraculous story of its foundation (under Pope Liberius) fixes the date of the earliest building little later than the reign of Constantine. It was re-erected in the fifth century by Sixtus III., to which remote time the magnificent nave adorned with mosaics is assigned. In Pierluigi's time neither the splendid Sistine nor Borghese Chapels were erected, otherwise the general aspect of the church can have changed little.

As far as is known Pierluigi had the choristers under his charge in his new post. That is to say, his stipend depended on their number. As a great deal of discussion has been aroused by a sentence in his dedicatory address to a later Pope, it may be well to make some inquiry at this point into the amount of his present income.

His monthly salary in S. Maria Maggiore amounted at first to thirteen, later, sixteen scudi on the addition of another chorister to the three already in his charge, in all about one hundred and ninety-two scudi.* For this sum Pierluigi was expected to feed the boys and give them musical instruction. That is to say, he received six scudi as salary, and two scudi and a half per head for each chorister. As quarters in the precincts were always assigned to the members of the choir, there would be no expenditure necessary for housing. Presents were customary after the great festivals of the Church. As we have already seen, these became so costly that the Chapter of St. John Lateran desired to check the practice. To these sources of income must be added Pierluigi's pension as ex-member of the Pontifical choir, amounting to a yearly sum of approximately fifty-eight pounds. Then comes an uncertain sum for dedications to rich patrons—habitual at the time—and the organization of music for occasions festive or mournful. The present was an epoch in which men of wealth and position desired to pose as excellent musicians, so that there were always compositions to be corrected and put into shape, or lessons to give. Of professional pupils an account will be given later. According to the custom of the times these lived in the master's house and became part of his family. As has already been seen, Pierluigi had property and turned it to practical account. A year or two later this was to be added to by the death of his father, and until the close of his own life, documentary evidences of the acquisition of small pieces of property show that this tended to increase. Presumably these facts were unknown to the Abbé Baini when he deplores so bitterly the poverty of the great musician. He was certainly not rich, but, all things considered, his income compares not unfavourably with many a Church musician of high repute to-day. It will be necessary to return to this subject later.

In this period the Abbé Baini places the romantic story that in many of the older biographies would seem to form Pierluigi's chief claim to the veneration of posterity. Increased knowledge has, however, thrown a new light on his place in musical history, one certainly not less great but more logical. One of the recurring quarrels referred to in the introductory chapter between musicians and clergy led to the intervention of Pope Pius IV., who finally decided to place the matter before the Council of Trent along with many others affecting Church discipline. According to Baini's version, the dispute was so sharp that the Churchmen proposed to exclude music altogether from the Office of the Mass; whereupon Pierluigi stepped in and effected the rescue of Church music by the composition of three masses so blameless, so transcendently beautiful, that the Pope compared them to the music of the heavenly spheres. That Pierluigi was capable of the feat no one would wish to deny, but the story as it stands cannot be substantiated in its details.

There is not a shadow of doubt, however, that the clergy did complain and with reason. One such remonstrance has survived. It is from the Bishop of Ruremonde, who states that after giving the closest attention he had been unable to distinguish one word sung by the choir.* Nor was this the only cause of complaint. The use of secular melodies by the titles of which the masses themselves were not infrequently referred to, as well as the interpolation of non-canonical text,† were entirely justifiable grievances. Members of the extreme party may have been of opinion that the only remedy was to do away with music in the service of the Church, or at all events to confine it within the limits of the ancient plain-song; one of the difficulties being that what was done and done well in the chief churches was marred by miserable execution of other choirs working under less favourable circumstances. As conformity was sought after as a matter of principle, it seemed safer to return to the ancient simplicity rather than to endeavour to bring the bad up to the level of the good. But it is certain that the friends of music would have intervened to protect it from such a drastic course.

The affair aroused the deepest interest. Many of the delegates to the Council applied previously to their over-lords for advice. The Legate to the Emperor Ferdinand I. followed this course and received a reply which shows a very pretty sense of discrimination on the Emperor's part. If the Church excluded sentimental music (mollior harmonia) let her retain figured music which so often awakens the spirit of piety. The signification of mollior harmonia is taken as a reference to the practice, just then coming into vogue, of modernizing the ancient modes or scales by the employment of accidentals (known as musica ficta) in order to soften the asperities of awkward intervals. The figured music referred to was obviously the highly organized counterpoint of the great masters of the time. The Council's verdict at the historic twenty-second sitting does not support Baini's account: ab ecclesiis musicas eas, ubi sive organo, sive cantu, lascivum aut impurum aliquid miscetur arceant, item sæculares omnes actiones vana atque adeo profana colloquia, ut Domus Dei vere domus orationis esse videatur ac dici possit: thus, instead of debating the banishment of music they declare it must be purified from the secular spirit, from anything profane; and in the twenty-fourth sitting the subject comes up again, when the prohibition of mollior harmonia is recommended. This mild ruling was in the best interests of musicians and clergy, for the new and dangerous secular spirit was gaining ground rapidly in Venice and Florence. At the same time, the Council were not reactionary. Figured music, which, as the Emperor Ferdinand pertinently remarked, so often awakened the spirit of piety, was not to be interfered with. Curiously enough, there is a strong likeness between this ruling and the words used by Pope John XXII. in a thirteenth-century dispute between clergy and musicians. Then, as now, it was suggested by the clergy that the best way to overcome the difficulty was a return to the ancient melodies, and the Pope interposed to save the rude harmonies then in use because in his opinion they assisted devotion.

Shortly afterwards Pius IV. appointed a committee to see that the general reforms enjoined by the Council of Trent were carried into effect. This was composed of eight Cardinals, of whom two were deputed to attend to the resolutions affecting music. Pope Pius, "the friend of music," showed his sympathy with its cause by appointing his nephew, Cardinal Carlo Borromeo, in whose judgment he notoriously placed great reliance, and Cardinal Vitellozzi Vitelli, both young men of great energy of character and passionate lovers of music. These entered on their task in a tactful and sensible manner. Instead of peremptory injunctions as to what should or should not be done, they called together eight Papal singers to consider the question, showing that they realized reform must be undertaken with the co-operation of the musicians themselves and not as punitive measures against them. At the first meeting a decision was easily reached that masses with secular themes should be banned, as, also, the interpolation of unauthorized text (tropes). But when Borromeo insisted that the words sung in the office of the Mass should be intelligible, the singers declared that this was impossible ; whereupon the Cardinal pointed out this was not so, for Pierluigi's Improperia and Costanzo Festa's Te Deum were instances to the contrary.* It is probable that Cardinal Borromeo had also in mind Pierluigi's Hexachord Mass, the theme of which was constructed on the first six notes of the scale. This was dedicated to the Pope in the preceding year (so what becomes of Baini's romance?) and through its admirable balance of sound forms an excellent illustration of the argument. It may indeed be assumed that Pierluigi's advice had already been sought as to the best means of carrying out the Council of Trent's recommendations, as it must have been long before seen that the future of Church music was in his hands. At that moment he was in the full tide of inspiration, and besides the Hexachord Mass—an example of the desired limpidity and containing a glorious Pleni for two sopranos and altos—there is some ground for believing one of the most famous of his works was already in existence in manuscript form, the celebrated Mass of Pope Marcellus. Moreover, a book of motets had already appeared, so what becomes of Baini's so-called Rescue of Church music? †

* The choir attendance-book notes, against April 28, 1565, that the Pontifical singers met together in the house of Cardinal Vitelli to sing certain masses before him so that he might hear if the text was distinct. (Geschichte der Päpste, Bd. vii.) The Jesuit de Cressolles relates he heard from a third person that Pierluigi himself said Pius IV. had withdrawn his opposition to church music on account of his (P.'s) masses.

† This was the first book of motets, dedicated to Cardinal Ridolfo Pio, and published in 1563, though not a single copy of this early edition has been found.

A pause may here conveniently be made to consider the above-mentioned motets, which mark an interesting phase in Pierluigi's development.

Custom permitted a greater freedom in the composition of the motet than in the mass, and modern influences were not so rigorously excluded. As the text was taken from the Bible or the Breviary the words of the mass were not in question, and the Church therefore saw no reason to interfere. The rise of the motet coincides with the dawn of the Netherlands School and already, at Josquin's hands, it received its final shape, the essential details changing little hereafter. But though the form, that of a cantus firmus accompanied by other voices in graceful florid counterpoint, changed little, it grew gradually to resemble the madrigal in inspiration, as one sister in the cloister may resemble another in the world. There was no attempt made at dramatic illustration of the text, but the music annotated the words, often to the extent of an attractive ingenuousness. The closeness of the weaving gets richer as Pierluigi advances in life, and the quality becomes more ecstatic, more fervent.* For example, there is a passage in O admirabile

* Generalization is difficult if it be borne in mind that the variety was practically inexhaustible, the text being drawn from so many sources.

commercium where the voices poise on the exclamation, as if unable from sheer wonder and awe to proceed, as if transfixed before a beatific vision ; and in the subsequent alleluja there is such a jubilation as though the joy were too great for articulation and the air became filled with short emotional ejaculations. Not infrequently the association of words and music was obtained through the selection of a theme from the plain-song melody for the day on which that portion of Scripture was read. Or one word, such as "holiness" or "praise" received a particular tone-colouring, or quality of sound, each time it recurred, thus impressing it on the mind of the listener and giving it significance. Like all the really great masters, Pierluigi concealed the art of his methods by employing an apparent simplicity, in other words, the art of concealing art. It is possible that he did, as Baini suggests, owe something to Costanzo Festa, who combined clearness of structure and expressiveness with the most learned contrapuntal dexterity and device,—Dr. Burney quotes his motet Quam pulchra es, anima mea as a model of its kind,—but the fact will always remain that what Pierluigi learnt at the hands of his predecessors and contemporaries he transmuted to a more precious metal.

It is pleasant to think, whether justifiably or not, that Pope Marcellus on the historic Good Friday of his short reign turned Pierluigi's attention to the sincerity and homogeneity of words with music which marks that composer's masterpieces. In that case, and the supposition is by no means far-fetched, the great Mass of Pope Marcellus was a recognition and a homage. Not only the general consensus of opinion but also the composer's own conviction agree that he reached in this work a more absolute expression of the ideal than any of his predecessors or contemporaries, and, in the dedication, his phrase novo modorum genere (of a new species of melodies) might be interpreted as showing him aware of the fact. It was only published in the second volume of the masses, Liber Secundus, in the year 1567, but certainly existed in manuscript as early as 1564, to which year experts assign the oldest existing copy, that belonging to the library of S. Maria Maggiore. As an example of the unassuming manner in which this masterpiece stole upon the world, it may be mentioned that copy bears no title whatever, and it is therefore impossible to decide whether this was accidentally omitted or whether it was added as an afterthought. Before stopping to consider this beautiful work in greater detail, it will be well to mention the rest of the masses contained in Liber Secundus. These were five in number:—De Beata Virgine; Aspice Domine; Salvum me fac; Inviolata; and Ad fugam. As s pointed out by Ambros, the last-named is not fugal in character but the voices sing in perpetual canon. Its inclusion in the second book of masses was as if Pierluigi wished to heighten the contrast between old and new methods and to show in what direction music tended.

The introductory portion of the Missa Papae Marcelli is written in the hypolydian mode with occasional incursion to the mixolydian. Beginning on the fifth it rises to the highest note of the mode, sweeping down to its final (C) and beyond. But nothing in this fragment of analysis could possibly convey to the reader the exquisite balance and repose of the opening phrase. It is like a benediction, quietening the spirit with a heavenly sense of peace; or it suggests a vision of the white wings of a dove folding as they come to earth. The short phrases forming the points of imitation seem not so much contrapuntal devices as passages of sheer inevitability. There is no sense of effort; the melodies shift and intermingle as if without design, but always forming harmonies which satisfy the mind beyond all telling. Perhaps the most striking feature is simplicity. In the score the erudition must astonish, but in performance the voices blend so naturally they impress the hearer with a sense of fortuitous confluence. The entire mass is written within the compass of two octaves and a fifth, but never for a moment is the ear wearied by so small a range. The absence of mechanical rhythm, or a strong or weak beat arbitrarily applied, permits a pure unbroken flow of sound and the sense of a calm, sweet, ordered progress, only interrupted as the voices rest on their allotted points of repose. In the Credo the choice of phrase is extraordinarily expressive, but it is in the Sanctus that Pierluigi reaches that fullness of sound, that suave harmony transfiguring the words as a nimbus adorns the pure, pale face of a saint. Extremely simple in design, it is full of little scale-passages, joyous flights of melodies suggesting the angels in a Fra Angelico fresco. This multiplication of similes may at least serve to show the imagination and idealism the master here displays. Such an experience tranquillizes and relieves the spirit, and the four-part Benedictus suggests the sending of an earthly embassy on high with a message of thankfulness and praise. Once again, it must be insisted that the apparent simplicity marks the perfection of the achievement, the plasticity of the material won after endless toil. Considered from this point of view, the old Netherlanders with their compound time-measurements, their canons and all the rest of their diabolical ingenuities, all had a hand in the Missa Papae Marcelli though the master-mind was necessary to divine the ultimate end. If to-day this mass can still work its wondrous spell on the jaded senses of the modern musician, what must have been its effect in the sixteenth century, in all the freshness of its revelation? Those heavenly harmonies surely seemed little short of miraculous as they echoed through that marvellous nave in S. Maria Maggiore, or down the five aisles of old St. Peter's.*

* The transverse wall already divided the old building into two. See pages 160-161.

CHAPTER V

THE death of Pius IV. occurred in 1565, the year in which he appointed Cardinal Carlo Borromeo, his nephew, with Cardinal Vitellozzi Vitelli supervisors of the reforms enjoined by the Council of Trent.

Pierluigi thus lost a generous perceptive patron who had raised his pension* as ex-member of the Pontifical Choir by thirty-six scudi annually. He was certainly not alone in regretting the late Pope, for in his successor Rome was to possess a Pontiff whose remarkable ascetism, as well as passionate devotion to the spiritual welfare of the Church allowed no time for, or interest in, matters of less gravity. It was obviously an affair of deep importance to musicians whether, or no, the Head of Christendom deigned to take an interest in Church music. Even if only within the limits of Rome itself (and it is clear that the field would be as wide as the domain of the Church) the tastes of a music-loving Pope must be respected, and he must be received on his periodical visitations to the individual churches with the choicest music the circumstances afforded. Probably there was considerable rivalry in this respect, to the great benefit of the musicians. It is a phenomenon not confined to any particular age or place, and no art is more dependent on its environment.

Like Julius III., delighting in splendid entertainments, Pius IV. was the last of the Popes to exhibit that love of art which characterized the periods of the Renaissance. This is abundantly apparent in Rome, for he takes high rank amongst the building pontiffs of the sixteenth century. But it was becoming increasingly evident that the great days of architecture were over, that a change in artistic formulas was at hand, classical yielding to baroque, with a craving for dramatic expression which ignored the inherent limitations of the material employed. The spirit of music was not destined to escape the influence, though the effects only made themselves apparent later. This was a foregone conclusion, for it follows that when a point of perfection has been reached in a certain direction, no further progress along the same lines is possible, and "old lamps" must be "exchanged for new." The result in this instance was the creation of opera, a logical development of the growth of personality. The first step in this direction was the expansion of orchestral accompaniment, though at present this was a purely secular development and did not invade the precincts of the Church to any extent before the end of the century. Thus Pierluigi was more fortunate than his great contemporary, Michelangelo, who, denied the happiness of completing the new church to San Pietro, felt his long life all too short. The musician put the finishing touches to his structure and died before the sweeping changes brought about by time. There is, by the way, no record that these two men were acquainted, but they can scarcely have escaped meeting on the common ground of their activities, and no more fruitful study for a picture of Pierluigi's environment can be made than that of the literature built round the tall saturnine figure in black satin doublet which, about this time, for ever disappeared from the streets of Rome.*

(Still, nothing affected the speed of Pierluigi's pen. In 1570 Liber Tertius came from the press. The titles of the eight masses it contained are : Spem in alium ; Primi toni ; Missa brevis ; De Feria —these for four voices ; L'homme armé ; and Repleatur os meum, for five. The two remaining

* It may perhaps here be recalled that Pierluigi set to music words by Michelangelo's friend, the exquisite lady, Vittoria Colonna, a slight thread of connection between the three personages consisting in the fact that Pierluigi was vassal of the Colonna family, who were probably not unaware of his remarkable genius.

masses are for six voices : De beata Virgine,* and the famous Hexachord Mass inscribed to Pius IV. in 1562, the Crucifixus and Pleni of which are acknowledged examples of Pierluigi's most angelic style. Without stopping to analyse it the student's attention may be drawn to the interesting employment of the sixth (hexachord) continually progressing up and down, a mechanical device which in no way hinders the flow or the unusual simplicity of effect. By the grouping of the voices Pierluigi produces the illusion of antiphonal choirs.†

Perhaps it has already been observed that the third volume contains a mass with a secular title, and this notwithstanding the Council of Trent's prohibition, the words running: "Music must be purified from the secular spirit, from anything profane." How is this injunction to be reconciled with a mass written on the theme of a popular song? The answer may be sought in the distinction between the spirit and the letter. As was already pointed out, in speaking of the mass Ecce Sacerdos Magnus, it was a sheer impossibility for the listener to detect the theme in the web of enveloping counterpoint. To the end of his life Pierluigi continued to select his cantus firmus

* The former version in Liber Secuudus is for four voices.

† It may be permitted to recall in this connection the antiphonal choirs S. Ignatius (1st century, A.D.) heard in his Vision of the Divine Birth.

where it pleased him ; usually calling his mass by a non-committal title, such as Sine Nomine (Without Name) or Primi Toni (In the First Tone) so that the proprieties were observed. But the mass entitled L'homme armé was openly avowed, for the celebrated theme had become consecrated by custom to such a use. Seventeen masses before Pierluigi's day were already written round the melody, and these by the most celebrated musicians of their time. The composer is unknown, but Dufay was the first to use the theme and thus started it on its notable career, for which reason the suggestion has been made—on rather slender grounds—that Busnois, his pupil, was the author. On the other hand, Dr. Burney attempted to identify it with one of the oldest traditional songs, the Chanson de Roland. The mystification was increased by finding a sort of trick-composition, made up of the first sections of three separate tunes, a practice to which the musical humorists of that time were much addicted, and known as Quodlibet, Fricassée, Pot-pourri, or Coq-à-l'asne.* The words associated with these and strung together reading thus—

Quand tu t'en vas.

—the want of correspondence between mood and tense remaining either unperceived or being set down to the inaccurate writing of the time. The first section alone of the tune was that identified with the words L'homme armé, the second line was proved to be the first of a song in an MS. now in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, with its proper context, and thus the riddle was solved.* The third line has not yet been identified.

As Dufay was the greatest master of his time, it became a matter of self-respect with succeeding musicians to employ this theme and to accompany it with every conceivable learned device ; in short, a species of self-imposed thesis. Josquin wrote two, † “a Netherlandish composition through and through, but also one of his most magnificent, a really monumental work.” Pierluigi worked on it twice ; on the first occasion, as we have seen, taking no trouble to disguise it ; on the second, simply giving his mass the title of Missa Quarta. The whole of Pierluigi's Church compositions stand as witnesses that he not only succeeded in abolishing “anything profane,” but found a new and ideal expression beyond any expectation the Council of Trent could have formulated. It may therefore be assumed this was the reason that his continued use of secular themes (to be regarded as so much technical raw material) escaped censure from the authorities. This, at least, is a pardonable hypothesis. Yet another mass in the same volume is based on a secular theme. This is the one entitled Primi toni, and founded on a madrigal by Pierluigi's former companion in misfortune, Domenico Ferrabosco, of which the first line is "Je suis son giovanetta." Only a few weeks before his death, in the last book sent to the press, Pierluigi included a mass founded on a French song "Je suis deshéritée," the secular words still existing through the curious circumstance that a French composer, by name Jean Maillard, in a mass on the same theme published at Paris in 1552, put the secular words under the liturgical in order*, that his ingenious manipulation of the theme might not escape notice. Little wonder, then, that the supposition arose, centuries later, that choirs were so lost to all sense of decency as to sing the secular words during the solemn function of the Mass itself.

* By Michel Brenet, Vie de Palestrina.

About this time there are indications of a certain restlessness, as if Pierluigi considered the advisability of obtaining some lucrative and congenial post in one or other of the numerous Courts in his own land or elsewhere. The changed conditions of the Pontifical Court probably counted for something in this, or the example of his celebrated contemporary, Orlando di Lassus, may have had its weight. It were but human if the Roman observed with envy the superb editions which through the generosity of his patron, Duke Albert of Bavaria, the Netherlander was able to issue from time to time. Whether or no Pierluigi sighed for a princely Maecenas who would release him from financial anxieties, and regard his work as conferring lustre on his reign, it is certain that the second and third volumes of masses were dedicated to one of the most prominent monarchs in Europe, His Most Catholic Majesty, Philip II. of Spain. According to Baini, this was at the request of the Spanish Cardinal, Pacheco, acting either on his own initiative, or because he had received a hint that such a dedication would not be displeasing to his royal master. If so, Pierluigi was justified in hoping for a brilliant appointment to the Court of Spain, and there was much in favour of such a step. The dignity and religious emotion of this most interesting school of composition are proof enough that Pierluigi would have been sure of the recognition and sympathy due to his genius. But Philip apparently contented himself with a bare message of thanks, and between the publication of Liber Secundus and Liber Tertius a new and celebrated name appears in the chronicle. It was already known that in Cardinal Ippolito d'Este Pierluigi found a patron: so much was certain from the dedication to the volume of motets which appeared in 1569. He refers there to great benefits received. One of the most princely figures of the late Renaissance, Cardinal Ippolito d'Este was a son of the Duke of Ferrara by his wife, Lucrezia Borgia, and to the advantages of his birth and position were added accomplishments quite in keeping with the traditions of the period. A man of enormous wealth, he built the famous villa at Tivoli, and among the palaces he possessed elsewhere, that situated on the Quirinal Hill in Rome was famous for the number and beauty of the ancient Greek and Roman statues collected there. Nor were his artistic tastes centred on plastic forms alone. It is recorded that, entrusted with highly delicate and important diplomatic missions to the Court of France in 1561 as Papal Legate, he took with him not only four hundred horsemen, but, what is more to the present purpose, his private choir.*

In Cardinal d'Este, then, Pierluigi might expect to find both an appreciative and generous patron. Although still holding his office in S. Maria Maggiore he seems to have obtained permission to absent himself from his duties there during the three hot months of summer. The entries to that effect in the expenses of the Este household for 1564 are conclusive.* Evidently it was a satisfactory arrangement on both sides, for in August, 1567, Pierluigi returned to the Cardinal's service, remaining there until the end of March, 1571. His salary was at the annual rate of 79 scudi romani, 20 bajocchi, and the expenses of his living were at the Cardinal's charge. Thus it was a permanent appointment with a yearly agreement. It is to be hoped that further documents will at some time or other throw light on this interesting period of the great composer's life. Slight as the information is, it is corroborated by other entries in the books of S. Maria Maggiore and, strangely enough, of the Lateran. After his return from the first engagement with the Cardinal he figures—in January, 1565—as witness to a legal document in the archives of the first-named basilica, there styled : Jo: Petro Aloysio alias Giannetto da Prenestina magistro cappello; a proof that he remained, in spite of his absence, attached to the church. But it is not possible to suppose that he retained his office there during his four years in the Cardinal's service, and as there is evidence that he was at St. John Lateran in Holy Week (1567), it certainly seems as if he had already left S. Maria Maggiore some months before he entered upon his second period of service with the Cardinal. As has been justly pointed out,* it is most improbable that any church would consent to forego the services of its choirmaster in favour of another church at such a time as Holy Week. The entry in the books of S. Giovanni in Laterano has a delightful quaintness. It runs: "A di XII. detto per un paro di capretti donati a Ms Gio: da pelestrina per ordine del R. do S.r Attilio Cecio per haverci aggiutato la settimana santa, bj. 90."† This gift in kind reminds us that Pierluigi still had property in Palestrina, to which place it is possible the goats were consigned.

But it is evident that Pierluigi still cherished thoughts of an appointment at some great foreign Court, and this although he had returned for the second time to his service with Cardinal d'Este. A document ‡ from the State Archives in Vienna shows this plainly. It is from the Ambassador Arco to His Majesty Maximilian II. and runs: "Il cantore Giov. di Palestrina si contenta di venir a servire la M^{te} V^{ra} per quattro cento scudi d'oro

† Trans.: "On the 12th given for a pair of goats presented to M. Gio da Pelestrina (sic) by order of the most Rev. Sir Attilio Cecio for having assisted in Holy Week, 80 bajocchi."

l'anno ; io ho fatto quanto ho potuto per ridurlo ancora a meno, ma non ho potuto ottener più. Adesso aspetterò che la M^{ia} V^{ra} mi comandi quello ho a fare circa quest' huomo, il quale mi vien lodato da molti."

Or :

"The singer (sic) Giov. di Palestrina is content to come and serve your Majesty for 400 gold scudi yearly. I have done what I could to reduce it to less, but have not been able to obtain more. Now I await your Majesty's commands what I am to do respecting this man who is praised to me by many."

But something intervened, for on January 3, 1568, the laconic notice from Arco runs : "Con Giov. di Palestrina non passerò più innanzi ;" or : "With Giov. di Palestrina I shall not go further," and whether there is any connection between these letters and a new development in Pierluigi's life-history is not at present elucidated. William of Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, whose wife was a daughter of the Emperor Ferdinand I., and consequently sister to the Emperor Maximilian II., here enters into the chronicle.

Until this moment there has been little to depend upon in the attempt to present Pierluigi's life and character in relation to his environment. Now, however, comes a remarkable series of letters not hitherto translated into English, which were discovered in the Mantuan archives by the Abbé Pietro Canal, who published them in his work entitled, Della musica in Mantova, notizie, tratte principalmente dell' archivio Gonzaga. The importance of them is such that it is, indeed, not too much to say that without these letters Pierluigi's personality would have remained sealed to the present generation. As it is, his relations with the Duke not only show the estimation in which the musician was held, but also give valuable indications of his opinions. Some of the letters were translated into German,* and their original number has been added to through later researches.† These Mantuan records are certainly some of the most rich in detail that we possess of life in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

The letters begin early in the year 1568 and continue to within a short time of Pierluigi's death. Most of them were personally exchanged, a few are written, at the Duke's request, by members of his entourage. Before proceeding to consider them at length it may be as well to remind the reader of the pains the reigning princes were at, to increase the splendour of their courts by the enlightened protection of the arts. This largely accounts for the peregrinations of artists, almost always at this period a feature of their life-history. It was quite the usual course to send the master of a choir on a journey through Europe in order to collect good singers for his lord's chapel, and an apposite instance of this is preserved to us by one Massimo Trajano. It refers to the Duke of Bavaria, the most generous patron of Orlando di Lassus.*

"The Duke, seeing that his predecessor's chapel was far beneath his own ideal, sent messages and letters, with gifts and promises, through all Europe to select learned musicians and singers with fine voices and experience. And it came to pass that in a short time he had collected as great a number of virtuosi as he could possibly attain, chosen from all the musicians in Germany and other countries by his composer the excellent Orlando di Lasso." There were other, and nefarious, ways of compassing the same end, for—in the history of Lassus himself—it is related that, as a young boy and the possessor of a singularly beautiful voice, he was stolen three times ; on the last occasion finding himself no lens volens in the service of a Gonzaga, Viceroy of Italy.

The Court of Mantua, in particular, cultivated music with both ardour and generosity, and Duke William of Gonzaga remained throughout the rest of his life a faithful and fervent admirer of Pierluigi's genius. Succeeding to the Dukedom at the age of fourteen, he was under the tutelage of his uncle, the highly cultivated Cardinal Ercole Gonzaga. After his marriage to the Emperor's daughter, his Court became famous for its brilliance, and he spared no pains to attract thither the finest singers and instrumentalists. Extremely desirous of getting the best possible material for the Church of St. Barbara, built and endowed by himself, he commissioned his choirmaster, Giaches Wert,* himself an excellent Flemish musician and an interesting personality, to obtain a mass from Pierluigi. A letter, dated February, 1568, acquaints us with the result. After the many compliments custom demanded Pierluigi informs the Duke that the mass is ready which his "rare musician Messer Giaches" had asked for, and it is herewith despatched—if it does not come up to expectation he hopes he will be allowed to try again, when the Duke must tell him whether he desires a long or a short mass, and whether he is very particular that the words should be clearly heard.† The answer to this letter is dated April 19, addresses the musician as Messer Giovanni Pietro Luigi da Palestina (sic), and contains and describes how the old faux-bourdon, or simple harmonization of the original plain-song usual in the preceding century, had recently given place to a free treatment, much the same as that Pierluigi himself employed with such effect in the Impropria. A description of this innovation may help to make the point clear.*

* Sometimes written "Jachet."

† The first section of this sentence may be taken to apply to the difference between a highly ceremonial mass and one for ordinary occasions; the latter section was probably an attempt to find out whether the Duke preferred the old or new school of composition.

"In the Sixtine Chapel the ritually-prescribed Miserere was sung to a simple faux-bourdon chant. The thrice-crowned friend of music" (Leo X.) "seems to have wished for something more artistic than this. . . ." And a little further on: "The traditions of the earlier period of simple faux-bourdon were still easily recognizable with their four- and five-part strophes and the nine-part closes." Obviously a choir of nine voices singing antiphonally and joining for the closes. "In many places the singers are only given the chord to which they must themselves adjust the syllables of the text to their proper declamatory accents; this is simple faux-bourdon. Other similar places in which the harmony changes are naturally written down. But between come flowing polyphonic passages with distinct melodic themes, with ingenious combinations of beautifully simple imitations. The Epilogue unites both choirs in a nine-part whole."

This description well explains the changes

brought about by the development of polyphonic art. The old simplicity was not done away with, but served as the surface on which to embroider a new and beautiful pattern. The historical sequence was there, the antiphonal choir, one of the earliest embellishments of the primitive church-music; the ancient melodies, first joined to rude harmonies, gradually enriched but always chiefly considered as a means of marking the proper declamatory accents; now comes the beautiful efflorescence—the flowing passages with distinct melodic themes; an art so admirably fitted for its purpose of accentuating and adorning the words it accompanies, that under favourable conditions the effect is stupendous.

To return to the letters: Pierluigi informs the Duke that as no copy exists of this new free species of faux-bourdon he has himself written it down for the use of the choir in St. Barbara, well knowing this would be pleasing to his patron.

The next letter in order is from Pierluigi again, and dated March 23, 1570, from which it is evident that the Duke has recently sent to Pierluigi a motet and madrigal for correction and criticism. Both are here given in a masterly compound of diplomacy and advice. In spite of the flattering terms employed he deals with the Duke faithfully, incidentally giving a little insight into his own methods of composition. "Mi pare," he says, "ancora che per la stretta tessitura delle fughe, si occupino le parole alli ascoltanti." Or, "Also it seems to me that the close interweaving of the fugues will prevent the words from being audible to the listeners ;" and continues, "ho segnati alcuni luoghi che mi par che quando si puo far di meno soni meglio l'Harmonia." Or "I have pointed out some places where it appears to me the effect would be improved by the reduction of parts." This letter was sealed with the device of a flowering plant, and scrollwise, Joannes. Petra. Loysio.

Five months later, on August 12, Don Annibale Capello writes to the Duke that he will shortly send him a motet by Pierluigi, composed for Philip II. of Spain. This is the one entitled Domine in virtute tua, included in the second volume of five-part motets published in 1572. Capello was the Duke's vassal and acted as his agent on many occasions, notably in matters concerning Church music. He was in the service of Cardinal d'Este, and dates this letter from Tivoli. The motet was duly sent to Duke William on September 2, with apologies for a poor copy, "as no one in Tivoli could be found to do it better." It may be mentioned here that the first book of motets, for five, six, and seven voices, published by Scoto, came out in 1569—the preceding year, containing such gems as O admirabile commercium : O magnum mysterium ; and the magnificent motet for Ascensiontide, Viri Galilaei ; so that the Duke's desire to possess new motets from Pierluigi's pen is comprehensible enough. Apart from the historical interest of the letters, these details serve incidentally to show the recognition of Pierluigi's genius by his contemporaries and the esteem in which his compositions were held.

In 1572 the Duke came to Rome, and though without a doubt Pierluigi was invited to his presence the records are silent. The ensuing letters show increased cordiality. In September of that year Capello writes to the Duke that he is sending him a book of motets for the use of the choir of Santa Barbara, a new arrival from the publishing house, Scoto of Venice. He adds, Pierluigi thinks it unnecessary to write himself to his patron as His Highness will be able to judge from the dedication how much he—etc., etc.,—in the usual flowery language of the time. Obviously Capello was in Rome at that moment, in direct communication with Pierluigi. The reception of the motets evidently gratified the Duke. His secretary, Zibramonte, also in Rome it appears, is desired by letter to wait upon Pierluigi and make him a present of twenty-five scudi, so “that he may see how much the Duke values the dedication." There was a fine flavour in the homage certainly not lost on a connoisseur such as His Highness of Mantua, for the volume contains specimens as erudite as they are beautiful. The motet Tribularer si nescirem may be compared to one of those subtle locks of Florentine workmanship, to the apparent simplicity of which years have gone in the making. In it Pierluigi reiterates the cry Miserere mei Deus at set intervals throughout the whole composition, mounting, a step at a time, to the fifth note of the mode, returning in the same manner to the final. Only a contrapuntist will realize the quality of the achievement. Again, in the motet, Gaude Barbara beata, in honour of the Patroness of Duke William's beloved church, there is perpetual imitation between the various parts. It goes without saying that never once does scholarship here take precedence of Pierluigi's habitual grace and suavity. The good people of Mantua quite conceivably listened to the praises of Santa Barbara on the day of her festa, totally unconscious of the musical tour de force to which Messer Giovanni Pierluigi treated them. But the Duke knew, Giaches Wert knew, and, for the rest, the Court of Mantua was a very home of learning, and Pierluigi was sure of a discriminating appreciation there if anywhere.

To the dedication on the first page of these motets a return must be made later, as it contains some highly interesting information, but for the moment it will be well to leave Mantua in order to consider certain changes which took place at this time in Pierluigi's fortunes.

CHAPTER VI

IT will doubtless not have been forgotten that Pierluigi, on being dismissed from the Pontifical Choir, was succeeded by Giovanni Animuccia, who became likewise Magister in musica et cantû to the Julian choir. This personage, a Florentine of saintly life, an excellent musician, was in close relation with his fellow-townsmen, the famous S. Filippo Neri,* one of the most striking and lovable personalities of that period. Among his many qualities S. Filippo was an enthusiastic musician, and clear-sighted enough to recognize music as a powerful auxiliary in saving souls, certainly his predominant passion. He thereupon founded an Order and included among the rules drawn up for its discipline "the contemplation of celestial things by means of heavenly harmonies," a sixteenth-century equivalent of "the education of the soul in virtue by the movement of sounds." Carrying his conviction to a practical issue in a larger field, he inaugurated religious services non-liturgical in character about the year 1558, desiring thereby to attract those simple souls to whom St. Augustine's definition of hymns as "praise to God with song" could not fail to make its appeal.

At first these services took place in a small oratory from which his recently instituted Order took its name of Oratorians, but they won such an instant and overwhelming success that it became necessary to move, first to one, then to another church, as each in turn grew too small for the ever-increasing congregations, and finally Neri applied to the Pope for permission to build a church of his own, the still-existing S. Maria in Vallicella, popularly known as the Chiesa Nuova, or New Church. Long before this evidence of success S. Filippo enlisted the services of his friend Animuccia, who organized the music in conformity with the Saint's wishes. In conjunction with motets and litanies, laudi—hymns of praise originally chanted by Savonarola and his monks as they paced the streets of Florence seventy years earlier—were particularly in evidence. The words chosen were adapted to a well-known air in order that the people might sing them readily. Animuccia soon composed others in addition to these, sending them to the printing-press from whence they were issued—one volume in 1565, another in 1570. Soon these congregational services became known as "oratorios" from their place of origin, the word acquiring later the special significance in relation to musical form which it has ever since retained. Music was thus the bait by which S. Filippo lured souls to his net, but he had still other means, labouring to bring a love of Nature in its higher aspect into the lives of men, thus directing them to the Creator. To this end it was his custom to conduct his flock to some hill on the confines of Rome—a favourite spot being the grounds of the present Villa Mattei on the Cœlian Hill—and there engage in spiritual songs, merry conversation and the like, using the loveliness of the scene before him to illustrate the love of God towards mankind.

In 1571 his friend and coadjutor Animuccia died. In the midst of his grief the Saint's thoughts turned to Pierluigi, with whom it is not unlikely he was already on friendly terms. Be this as it may, he invited him to succeed the dead musician as musical director of the oratorios, an offer Pierluigi forthwith accepted, and applied himself to the work with energy. There was certainly a divine fitness in the choice, for whose music could more effectually assist the congregation of the Oratorians, or the community itself, in the contemplation of celestial things by means of heavenly harmonies? A happier phrase than that could not have been found to describe Pierluigi's music.

But Animuccia's death had other consequences. The post of Master of the Julian Chapel was once again vacant. Possibly Pierluigi had never resigned himself to his dismissal from the service of the Vatican, in spite of the important posts he had meanwhile filled elsewhere. At all events he left the service of the Cardinal d'Este and applied for his old office. It is obvious that the Master of the Pope Marcellus Mass was not likely to apply in vain, and he was shortly back again in the position he filled on his first brilliant promotion from the old cathedral of S. Agapito.* The only difference was in the title. Formerly "Master of the Boys," his new style was "Master of the Julian Chapel," with four boys under his charge and a monthly salary of six scudi and thirty-six bajocchi, instead of the six scudi sixty bajocchi and living expenses he received from the Cardinal, a sufficient answer to the assertion made more than once recently that Pierluigi showed a somewhat mercenary spirit.

According to the Abbé Baini, on taking up his duties again at St. Peter's, Pierluigi lodged in the choir-school attached to the Capella Giulia, a building flanking the atrium of the old basilica not pulled down before 1605. Thanks to sketches preserved in the Vatican Library and elsewhere by M. v. Heemskerck, Grimaldi, and other anonymous artists, there is no difficulty in forming an idea of the precincts of old St. Peter's as they appeared in the middle of the sixteenth century. These show that the great piazza was far from presenting the appearance of to-day. The magnificent columns were not in place before 1667: the fountains were erected still later: and the famous Egyptian obelisk brought to Rome by Caligula—the silent witness of so many bloody scenes of Christian martyrdom—stood at the side of the old basilica, where the sacristy now stands, to be moved only a few years later, by order of Sixtus V. in 1586,* to its present position, the centre of the great ellipse. In a drawing by Heemskerck, somewhat earlier in date, are shown the high walls enclosing the precincts of the Vatican, already some seven hundred years old, the Loggia, then unglazed, and with a free view on to the piazza, and the façade of the atrium forming a line with the so-called Benediction Loggia, from which, on the Thursday before Easter, the Bull "In Coena Domini" was publicly read. The whole of the space occupied at the present day by the façade alone was then filled by buildings, others flanked the atrium on the north side, serving various ecclesiastical purposes. In one of these, then, Baini asserts that Pierluigi was housed, under what conditions there is at present no evidence forthcoming. Here, on the very ground soaked by the blood of St. Peter, hallowed and sanctified to the faithful by every association, the Church's strong citadel, there were signs of great changes, the old order giving place to new. The ancient church was already half disintegrated, already the gigantic drum of the new dome, rising slightly to the left of the old building, commanded the entire precincts. In this unfinished state it remained for many years still, after the mighty brain which planned it was at rest, for means lacked (from Pius V.'s determination to put down the gross abuses connected with the sale of indulgences) to proceed with the erection of the new building. Another of Heemskerck's sketches,* taken from a point between the old and new churches, shows the ruined north transept, demolished to clear the way for the new construction, though a transverse wall screened it from the rest of the ancient basilica which continued for many years yet to fulfil its sacred functions. The demolition of this venerated building was certainly the most striking object on which the great musician's eyes rested, while the erection of the new was a cause of never-failing interest.

From this great centre of the Church's life, Pierluigi continued to issue composition after composition. Taking into account his creative activity, as well as his ordinary professional work, it is obvious that his time was very fully occupied. But it is pleasant to hear that he yet found time to knit with S. Filippo Neri a close friendship destined to last as long as life itself. Of patrons we have heard in plenty, but this is the first friend of whom there is any record, and the personality of both saint and musician becomes more coherent through this simple fact. As Neri was much attached to Cardinal Carlo Borromeo it may be that Pierluigi found two friends instead of one, both men capable of sympathetic comprehension of his genius through their love of music. In the absence of any definite appreciation of Pierluigi as a man by his contemporaries this association acquires a particular value. If S. Filippo discovered in the musician qualities of mind and heart which won and retained his affection, it would be difficult to claim a finer testimony to the worth of Pierluigi's personality.

During these years two more volumes of motets appeared, also a new species of composition. The so-called Madrigali Spirituali (not published before 1581 and 1594 respectively) were written about this time for the members of S. Filippo's congregations. Simpler in form and composition than the style of music considered fitting for the Mass, they were thus well suited to the class to whom the Saint's services made their special appeal, and it may be assumed that they were often sung during those excursions to the hills of the Gianicolo and Cælio of which S. Filippo was the organizer and leader. Here again was an instance of the changing times. To the almost pagan enjoyment of beauty and art and learning in which the Roman world was steeped when Pierluigi first entered it, a careful observance of religious ceremonies and duties was substituted. Though S. Filippo's teaching was on the same theme of beauty, he conceived it from the point of view of God's gift to man who, in his perception and use of it, must acknowledge this and render thanks to the Giver, worship and enjoyment becoming one. Pan and his pipes had again withdrawn to the ilex groves sheltering the ruined temples of a classic past, and the populace flocked around a new David with his harp. These spiritual songs on secular lines opened up fresh paths of spontaneity and expressiveness destined to bear fruit later on. But Pierluigi did not confine his pen to sacred madrigals, writing others secular, pièces d'occasion some of them, one such being written to celebrate the victory of Lepanto in 1571 :—*

*“Le selv’ avea al lido Eusono

what time Don John of Austria and Marc Antonio Colonna led the confederated troops against the Turks. Such an occasion for a madrigal from a loyal son of the Church requires no excuse, but there was a diplomatic reason if it were needed: Pierluigi and his family being vassals of the Colonna and owning property in their lordship.

A second volume of madrigals, though dated 1586, may be conveniently mentioned here, for this was dedicated to Giulio Cesare Colonna, who became Prince of Palestrina in 1571 † and died in 1581, or five years before the date of publication of these madrigals; thus giving rise to the inference that it was a re-issue of an earlier edition since lost, a theory strengthened by the innumerable misprints, for which only the circumstance of a fresh edition, without the supervision of the composer by Venetian publishers, would sufficiently account. This question of the date is otherwise important. Two years before 1586, in

* The first book of madrigals appeared in 1555.

† A man of culture and learning and benefactor to his town, so that Pierluigi had excellent reasons for desiring to dedicate his madrigals to this Prince.

the dedication of the celebrated motets on the Song of Solomon* to the reigning Pontiff, Gregory XIII.,† Pierluigi beats his breast over the sins of his youth, no other on this occasion than the composition of madrigals ! It is somewhat difficult to take this Apologia pro madrigali sue quite seriously, for he laments he is numbered amongst those musicians who consecrated their talents and their art to loves unworthy of the name and profession of a Christian (!) the mildness of the offence not justifying so tremendous a self-condemnation. This raises the point referred to earlier. If the second volume of madrigals appeared first in 1586, what becomes of Pierluigi's consistency ? Were they, however, written about the time Giulio Cesare Colonna became reigning Prince of Palestrina (in 1571) the difficulty disappears, Pierluigi having ample time for repentance between these dates. Again, it was in 1571 that S. Filippo Neri invited him to replace Animuccia as musical director of his services, a time at which it may be supposed he fell under the influence of the Saint, and his conscience grew more sensitive. However this may be, the manifestation of such austerity was nothing unusual in these times. Such a spirit had always existed, side by side with the looser ideas of the Renaissance ; as, for instance, the assertion of

* Dealt with on pp. 131 et seq.

† Successor to Pius V.

Morales that he despised "all secular, let alone frivolous music : what should be said of such a one who prostituted the noble God-given gift to the service of frivolous worthless ends ? " These words bear a strong resemblance to those used by Pierluigi in the dedication.

Amongst the madrigals in the above-mentioned volume is that entitled Alle rive del Tebro, perhaps the best known of all. Another, and one of the most beautiful, is Amor quando fioria : the words of which are taken from Petrarch's ballata in his Death of Laura, between the third and fourth cantos. In this form of composition Pierluigi was at his best when the words called for a gently elegiac setting, suited to the pure passionless sounds he of all musicians best understood. Our own countryman, Thomas Morley, puts the matter so well that we cannot do better than quote his words :—

"You must possesse yourselfe," he says, "with an amorus humour for in no cōposition shall you proue admirable except you put on and possesse yourself wholly with that vaine wherein you compose." For this reason, if that alone, Pierluigi was much more in his element when he proceeded to the composition of madrigali spirituali, which combined a beautiful idealism with a natural and human vein of expression. They may be described as the canti popolari of the Church, and certainly served to spread his fame amongst that class of people to whom his masses and motets, for lack of musical knowledge, would make less appeal.

Pius V. died in May, 1572. He was buried in S. Maria Maggiore, where his tomb in the Sixtine Chapel is to be seen to-day. His whole strength was put forth in the cause of Church reform, and amongst his other activities connected with this end he was responsible for the revision of the breviary and missal, a logical outcome of the recommendations made by the Council of Trent during the preceding pontificate. Nor did he confine himself to the text alone. Once again there is an allusion to the burning question of eliminating all music other than the Gregorian chant from the Church in letters he wrote, in 1567, to the Bishop of Lucca, complaining of some musical performances during Holy Week in that town; and again in 1570, over Church music in Mexico.* As all intercalations of text were now made illegal, the Master's mass Ecce sacerdos magnus was necessarily shelved; another, De beata Virgine, was also affected; but he was able to re-write the offending portions of this, and to issue a new edition.

About this time Pierluigi's financial circumstances again improved. According to a will dated November 7, 1572, his wife Lucrezia succeeded to the half of a small inheritance through the death of her sister Violante. Thus, taking into consideration the power of his patrons, the great activity of his pen, and his relatively assured position, it may be assumed that he was able to devote himself to his work without anxiety.

It is now time to ascertain what influence he exerted over contemporary musicians in Rome.

CHAPTER VII

THE prevailing tendency of musical art throughout the sixteenth century has already been grouped into two schools, each with a great name at its head, Josquin des Près and Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina. These may be said to have divided the century between them, for there was no outstanding composer between Josquin's death and Pierluigi's advent to weaken the earlier influence. There were also cross currents : sub-divisions, as it were, starting from the purely intellectual problems of the Netherlanders and tending towards the expressiveness and suavity of sound which gave the ultimate beauty and finish to the Roman School. The composers Morales and Festa may be placed in this category. Not until the last years of the century was there more than a hint of the new influences destined to sweep away that contrapuntal art so admirably adapted for the great basilicas and cathedrals. Thus Pierluigi had not to contend with alien influences and changing conceptions of artistic beauty, he maintained his prestige unimpaired until the end.

This being so, the number of his pupils, as far as is at present known, is surprisingly small. Though there are several who exhibit traits which stamp them as his spiritual children, only two outside his family circle can be named with certainty. These are Giovanni Andrea Dragoni, who claims Pierluigi as his master in the dedicatory address of a volume of his compositions; and Francesco Soriano, who is claimed by Pierluigi as his pupil in a letter written by him to William of Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua. The first-named pupil became choirmaster in the church of S. Giovanni in Laterano from 1581 until his death in 1594; the second, Soriano, became choirmaster in S. Luigi dei Francesi about 1581; after 1588 filling the same office in S. Maria Maggiore. At some time between these dates he was in the service of the Duke of Mantua to whom he dedicated a book of five-part madrigals. Born in 1549 he had, up till 1597, published only two volumes of madrigals, after which he turned to the composition of Church music. Pierluigi's appreciation of him as a musician will appear in a letter written to the Duke of Mantua later. Soriano composed music to the Passion of our Lord according to the four Gospels; showing a dramatic feeling for effect which gives him a place between the old and the new school.* He also composed a Hexachord mass described as one of the most inspired works of the later Roman School.* No mere imitator of his master was he, but a man full of energetic force of character.

But there is one who, never a pupil of Pierluigi's, produced compositions bearing the same spiritual relationship to the master as if Pierluigi's genius had found its feminine counterpart. This was Tommaso Lodivico da Vittoria, a Spaniard, born at Avila about 1540. He appears to have been intended for the priesthood, and for that reason was sent to the Collegium Germanicum in Rome. This celebrated College, founded by S. Ignatius Loyola under Julius III. in 1552, was considered as one of the most distinguished places of education in Rome, nor was it created solely for Teutons, but numbered amongst its inmates members of noble families throughout Europe.

The date on which Vittoria entered the College was 1565, and by 1573 he was filling the post of choirmaster there, receiving a commission to set to music the psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," for a particular occasion, a farewell service before the departure of the students from their old home in the Palazzo Colonna to their new one in the Palazzo della Valle. The College has had many flittings since then and its present home is in the Via San Nicolo da Tolentino from whence its red-garbed students continue to illuminate the streets of Rome, but, in all that time, it has maintained its reputation for good music and possesses a list of choirmasters of which any college might be proud, including, as it does, such names as Giovannelli, Pierluigi's successor at St. Peter's, Anerio, Stabile, and the world-famous Carissimi. Vittoria remained at the Collegium Germanicum until 1578, after which date it is not yet established where he lived and worked, though it has been suggested that he followed Pierluigi as choirmaster of the Altaemps Chapel.* However that may be, he is reported to have been on the closest terms of friendship with him. An anecdote exists that he discarded his distinctive dress as a Spaniard for one resembling that customarily worn by the master, and trimmed his beard on the same pattern. True or not, it is a pleasant story, and must have had some foundation.

But if Vittoria copied Pierluigi's coat, his genius remained independent. The most that can be said is that the stronger fibre of his great friend's mind influenced his own more ardent, passionate, less robust temperament, which has been compared in certain aspects to that of Teresa of Avila, his compatriot, in its glowing mysticism. It is characteristic of the man that not a single secular composition of his has been found, in which respect he shows himself of one mind with his compatriot, Morales. While much of his work bears the true Palestrinian impress, yet Vittoria never quite reached those soaring, majestic heights to which Pierluigi rose at will. The Spaniard's note was more personal, more human, more pleading; he gazed at the Cross as Mary Magdalene might have done.

* The date of Pierluigi's activities at the Altaemps Chapel has not yet been ascertained, only that he was director there for some years.

It is said that through the jealousy of the Pontifical Choir, Vittoria was given no official post in the Vatican. If so, it was their loss. The state of his private circumstances is not known, but either he had a powerful patron, or was in possession of ample means, for he was able to bring out sumptuous editions of his works.

Other contemporaries were the two Naninos. The eldest brother, Giovanni Maria, a remarkable contrapuntist and one of the most learned musicians of his time, had a school of composition in which it has been suggested that Pierluigi taught. No confirmation of this can be found. Nanino's compositions warrant the inference that Pierluigi was his master; for this reason he is sometimes spoken of as the founder of the Roman School, a statement manifestly absurd ; nevertheless, two of his compositions, Hodie nobis coelorum est, and Hodie Christus natus est, are frequently quoted as masterpieces imbued with true Palestrinian inspiration. Annibale Zoilo, Pierluigi's immediate successor at the Lateran, later, a member of the Pontifical Choir ; Felice Anerio, who began his career in 1575 as choir-boy under Pierluigi in the Julian Chapel and ended it in 1614 as Composer to the Pontifical Choir in Pierluigi's place (in 1585 choirmaster in the English College) ; Giovanelli, pure Palestrinian in style, Vittoria's successor at the Collegium Germanicum and Pierluigi's successor in the Julian Chapel,—all these were most excellent musicians and in high repute. Both Anerio and Giovanelli were particularly famous as madrigalists ; indeed, Anerio, until he entered upon his duties as Composer to the Pontifical Choir, was more known for this form of composition than for Church music. Ingegneri, a native of Verona born about 1545 (to 1550), whose life was chiefly spent in Cremona, and who composed Responses for Holy Week which for years were considered to be by Pierluigi—even appearing in the collected edition as Opus dubium until they were traced to their rightful owner ; Stabile, possibly a pupil of Pierluigi's ; and Allegri, a pupil of the elder Nanino, whose Miserere is still performed in Passion Week every year at St. Peter's, were all educated in the true tradition and carried on the glories of the school. Yet others were Constantini, said to have represented the "pure, noble style in its unadulterated form long after the sun was setting on its dominion," and Vincenzo Ugolini, again a pupil of the elder Nanino, and a typical member of the school.*

With one important exception † these, then, are the names of the more outstanding members of the Roman School. Pierluigi's figure dominates them all; indeed, Vittoria, beautiful composer as he was, moves in a subdued light in relation to the great Palestrinian. This was clearly recognized, even if the Netherlander Orlando di Lasso be admitted as a formidable rival. But great as Orlando was, there was a quality about Pierluigi's genius essentially individual and essentially Roman. If the fancy be permitted, his style recalls the golden light of the Eternal City at sundown, a distinctive glory which every one familiar with it will at once recognize. This is the more noteworthy as Music is the only art Rome can claim as her own. Unrivalled as she was in the attraction she exercised over the great artists of all ages, she borrowed lustre from their greatness, they were only her sons by adoption. In Pierluigi's case this was not so, and obviously this fact was a source of peculiar satisfaction to the Romans, who may be said to have smarted for upwards of three hundred years under the foreign yoke of the Pontifical Choir. The native musicians later took advantage of their ascendancy to organize a society in which no foreigners might be admitted, a sufficient indication of present strength and ancient jealousy, though this rule was subsequently and wisely to be relaxed. Such close corporations have always proved themselves against the best interests of the art they were designed to help.

For the moment enough has been said to justify the assertion that the Roman School was an established fact, with Pierluigi as its chief figure; to sum up in the grandiose words of a Venetian admirer,* writing some years later, "he was the Ocean towards which all streams flow."

CHAPTER VIII

AT the end of the year 1572 death removed Pierluigi's great patron, Cardinal Ippolito d'Este. It is to be hoped that more will some day be known of their relations. The Cardinal's love for all forms of art was as much a mainspring in his life as his genius for diplomacy. The loss of so discriminating a patron was certainly a blow to the musician.

About the same time, however, an overwhelming personal sorrow befell Pierluigi. Of its nature we learn in a letter written by Bishop Odescalco to the Duke of Mantua, dated from Rome on January 3, 1573. This letter evidently refers to an earlier conversation between the Duke and Pierluigi, probably during the former's stay in Rome some months previously. Before giving the text we will return for a moment to the book of motets mentioned earlier as dedicated to the Duke, for the dedication throws some light upon the subject.*

In this the composer says :—

* See p. 78.

Quapropter haec tuo nomini consecro munuscula, in quibus interpositas quoque fratris, liberorumque meorum primitias non negliges deliberare, ut tibi non me unum duntaxat, veram etiam domum omnem meam plurimum debere non obscure cognoscas.

It thus appears that not only Pierluigi's two sons had profited by his teaching but his brother Silla also, all three adopting the profession of music. By offering these firstfruits from his sons' pen Pierluigi probably hoped to fulfil a double purpose ; not only to convince the Duke of his whole-hearted devotion, but also, with a father's far-seeing eye, to secure for his two boys the valuable patronage he himself enjoyed. Two motets were by his brother Silla, one each by his sons Ridolfo and Angelo. It is evident that Angelo possessed remarkable talent—he was only seventeen at the time,—while the work of his elder brother Ridolfo and his uncle Silla show a level of proficiency testifying to the soundness of their instruction if not suggesting so much force of inspiration. But it seems that Ridolfo's talents did not end here. As will presently appear, he was a proficient player on several instruments, giving colour to the supposition that Pierluigi directed and arranged chamber music for his patrons, an indispensable feature, at this time, of festive occasions. Hitherto Pierluigi's inner life has remained more or less closed to us. A temporary illness mentioned in the letter to the Duke of Mantua, his friendship with S. Filippo, his patrons, his surroundings—so far as it was possible to reconstruct them—the tradition of a happy marriage,—these were the brief notes of a life which left itself more completely to be divined in the serenity and idealism of his compositions. But now we get a singularly attractive glimpse of a united family, two accomplished sons “of rare morals” of Pierluigi’s brother, and a devoted mother.

The Bishop writes :—

“The son promised to your Excellency by Palestina (sic) for the service of S. Barbara died a few days ago, and after him from sorrow, a brother of Palestina himself, lettered, a good musician by profession and of good morals. For this reason it is useless to think more about it and truly I hear from all that this young son of Palestina was a young man who besides being of suitable age, twenty-two years, was of very good and rare morals, a good logician and philosopher ; well educated in Greek and Latin, and most excellent musician and player on all sorts of instruments, so much so that I believe he would have been after the heart of your Excellency.”

Here is a picture of the family of the great musician which does him infinite credit. In the midst of his own incessant work he yet saw to it that his sons received the necessary education for taking up a good position in life. "Most excellent musician and player on all sorts of instruments" might be expected, but "a good logician and philosopher" suggests culture and refinement beyond the ordinary. In the year 1566 both sons were entered as students in the Seminarium Romanum, but appear later to have abandoned the intention of becoming priests. The Bishop continues—

"There remains still another son of eighteen to nineteen, who has almost all the same good qualities, but I hear his mother will never consent to be deprived of him, having lost that one of so much promise as well as his uncle in twenty days."

Of Ridolfo the eldest son, there was already a glimpse in earlier days, as choir-boy in the church of S. Giovanni in Laterano. That was twelve years ago ; now it was a question of establishing him in life, and his father hoped to place him in the brilliant court of Mantua for the service of which he had so well prepared him. Pierluigi's brother, Silla, is a more shadowy figure, "lettered, a good musician by profession and of good morals." It remains still to be discovered if he held any important post in one of the Roman churches, or whether he devoted himself to his celebrated brother, helping him in his professional work.

This double bereavement marks a turning-point in Pierluigi's career, and from henceforth sorrow dogged his footsteps. Soon come many references to ill-health and misfortune. But he never faltered in his work and it may very well be that composition was the staff on which he leant in those dark days, and which brought him comfort. On April 17, 1574, the veil is again lifted for a moment when Annibale Capello writes to the Duke that Pierluigi is too busy to criticize a mass written by his great patron in Mantua, whose ambition has evidently been spurred on by praise. In Capello's courtier-like phrases the almost startling truth emerges that Pierluigi is engaged on work of even more importance than that most important mass which reveals the Duke as much "master of the Muses as of the Mantuans!"—a neat compliment which it is to be hoped the Muses, who are more used to be wooed than governed, did not resent. The momentous work on which Pierluigi was engaged was a new set of Lamentations commissioned by the Pope himself (Gregory XIII.). In Capello's words :—

"Et a credere insieme che l'occupationi di M. Gio da Palestina (sic) in comporre alcune lamentationi per ordine del Papa e nella cappella di questi giorni santi hanno fatto tardare esso M. Gio a fare alcune poche considerationi et auertimenti sopra la detta compositioni : le quali si conosce bene essere stati da lui pretermessi per hauer atteso a cose maggiori.”

Which may be translated :—

“And likewise to believe that M. Gio da Palestina’s labours in composing some lamentations by the Pope’s orders and in the choir during these holy days have caused M. Gio to be behindhand in making some few remarks and observations on the said composition, which we can well understand have been pretermitted by him because he had to attend to greater matters.”

This letter, not hitherto mentioned in existing biographies, refers to a set of Lamentations which it may be well here to point out were anterior to those composed some years later for Sixtus V., not those, in short, which that Pope insisted (to the discomfiture of the Pontifical Choir) upon substituting for some hitherto in use by Carpentras. Pierluigi wrote four sets in all, the last being the first set to be published.* The Lamentations referred to by Capello were either those found in the Altaemps Chapel, or still another set supposed by Haberl to have been written while Pierluigi was Master of the Choir at S. Maria Maggiore. The evidence is in favour of the latter hypothesis, as there exists in the library of the Cappella Julia a beautiful codex, on the first page of which is written in Pierluigi's handwriting :—

identified as that attributed to the S. Maria Maggiore period. The point is of importance, as the first three sets bear neither date nor dedication.

On the same date as that on which Capello's letter was written Pierluigi himself wrote to the Duke, apologizing for his delay and making a few rather perfunctory criticisms, though they were set forth with the usual complimentary additions. Ten months later, on February 9, 1575, he writes again, addressing the Duke by his recently acquired title—“Duke of Mantua and Montferrata,” bestowed by the Emperor Maximilian II., and it is evident, from the nature of the letter, that he has been commissioned by his patron to set a canzone to music, though this has not yet been identified. One more incident in this year : the Chapter of S. Maria Maggiore tried to tempt Pierluigi to return to them by the time-honoured expedient of offering him a larger salary. Pierluigi took the favourable opportunity of convincing the Chapter of St. Peter that they had necessarily no monopoly of his services, and the Chapter recognized the cogency of the argument by raising his very moderate stipend to fifteen scudi, "in consideration of the worth and excellence of his person," thus honouring themselves in their appreciation of their Magister Capellae Juliae. The matter was settled by the employment of white and black beans; those in favour of the proposition using white, those against, black. A single black bean was discovered in the urn. It would be interesting to know who was the Beckmesser!

This pleasant little episode was hardly needed to show that Pierluigi was now receiving full public recognition. It was not to be expected that this should yet be complete—a man's reputation rarely attains to this in his lifetime, and when it does it is not infrequently an unhealthy sign for its duration. But in the same year and in the last place where a prophet's fame is supposed to establish itself—in his own country—Pierluigi's fellow-citizens gave a signal proof of their pride and joy in their great townsman.

It was the year of the Jubilee, and a great procession of some fifteen thousand persons streamed through the ancient gate of Palestrina on their way to Rome. The banners of the Confraternities of the Crucifixion led the way, followed by the Blessed Sacrament. The Palestrinians formed themselves into three choirs, and entered Rome singing Pierluigi's music. What they sang has not been recorded, only that it was "tre belle musiche," a statement easy of acceptance. This beautiful homage and public recognition from their own people was certainly very gratifying to Pierluigi and his wife Lucrezia, and the memory would long abide with them.

But joy was short-lived. Another great sorrow befell them, and their son Angelo died; at a moment when life must have presented its most desirable aspect. Married while extremely young—he cannot have been more than nineteen at the time—he chose a wife from his father's birthplace, a rich burgher's daughter who brought him as dowry some 1740 scudi.* In February, 1574, the young couple hired a house in the Borgo (as the district within the fortified Leonine City was called) in the Piazza delli Scarpellini, and there their first child was born who was baptized in November of that year. In 1576 a son, Angelo (the first was a daughter, Aurelia) followed, the year of his father's death. There is nothing to show what struck the young man

This, according to custom, was secured on her father-in-law's property, and we incidentally learn that Pierluigi possessed one house in the contrada Egypti, another in the regione Parionis in contrada Sarti, and a vineyard near the ancient and beautiful church of S. Lorenzo outside the walls.

down, but this new blow fell only three years after the death of Ridolfo, so it is no matter for astonishment that Pierluigi's health was shaken. Even the most buoyant nature could scarcely hope to react from so much grief, and in Angelo it is probable Pierluigi's hopes of a successor were centred, for the motet which is all that is at present known of his compositions much surpasses that of his brother or uncle. Though Ridolfo and Angelo were the only sons mentioned in the Bishop's letter : there was still a younger one, by name Igino. Of his personality the accounts are somewhat conflicting, but on the whole are not in his favour. Of him more later. There is no doubt that in Ridolfo and his brother Angelo Pierluigi possessed sons who would have brought great credit to their father's name, and with them disappeared much of the happiness life could afford him.

We now come to a transaction which is far from clear. On October 25, in that year (1576), the Pope issued a brief that the Directorium Chori was to be revised. This was an inevitable sequence to the revision of the Breviary and Missal already completed in the previous reign. Obviously a colossal undertaking, it demanded unremitting attention and a corresponding expenditure of time. As was only to be expected, Pierluigi, with Annibale Zoilo, his successor at

S. Giovanni in Laterano, was requested to do the work. It is said that the Graduale was actually completed, Pierluigi undertaking the Temporale and Zoilo the Sanctorale as their respective shares, when, for some unknown reason, they abandoned the project and made no attempt to get their already completed work published. Why? There are various conjectures but no certainty. One explanation was that the revisers treated the ancient chant too drastically; making alterations in the melodies and thus incurring the wrath of conservative persons. In support of this theory it remains on record that a certain Fernando de Las Infantas complained to no less a person than Philip II. of Spain on the subject, gaining his approval and valuable support in subsequent representations to the Holy Father. Another suggestion is that Pierluigi and Zoilo found they were expected to do the work for fame alone and, not being content with this, left it uncompleted. Were it so, that were as good a reason as any other: the labourer, indeed, being worthy of his hire; but that would have constituted a grievance, and there is no reason to suppose that Pierluigi considered himself badly treated. In 1582 the Bolognese, Giovanni Guidetti, one of Pierluigi's reputed pupils, also Chaplain to Gregory XIII., brought out his revision of the Directorium Chori, with a laudatory preface by Pierluigi. Surely this disposes effectually of the supposition that there was anything unpleasant in the affair? Guidetti followed this publication up with a setting of the Passion according to each of the four Gospels, an Office for Holy Week, the Lamentations, and the Prefaces. All these without any protest whatever from either Pierluigi or Zoilo; indeed, in one instance, Pierluigi's co-operation is actually suspected. As far as posterity is concerned, it is evident that Pierluigi was more advantageously employed in giving to the world his masses and motets than on work which any good musician with the historical sense, with judgment and accuracy, could do as well; and it is not impossible that, perceiving this himself, he nominated Guidetti as a substitute. Yet one other possible explanation, a reference to which occurs in a letter from Annibale Capello to the Duke of Mantua under the date October 18, 1573, may be advanced here. He tells the Duke that Pierluigi has been unable to give effect to certain wishes expressed by his patron on account of grave indisposition affecting both his head and his sight. Here is sufficient reason for abandoning a task involving great strain on eyesight, as well as close application. A letter from Pierluigi himself, a fortnight later, refers to his illness and in the following terms :—

“God knows that when the *canti fermi were brought to me I was more distressed at my inability to serve you than by my illness.”

In a preceding letter Capello had written on a subject very near to the Duke's heart, the purity of the plainsong, and Pierluigi in his reply proceeds to give interesting details upon the disposition of the voices in a mass he had recently composed, the wording of the whole permitting the inference that the Duke had given him a similar commission to the one he was at that time engaged on for the Pope, the revision of the Ecclesiastical Chant. Here is the passage—

“Et se l'Altezza V si contentara si mandaranno in stampa con il graduale che nostro signor mi ha commandato ch'io emendi.”

That is—

“If Your Highness agrees, these chants can be printed with the Gradual with whose revision His Holiness has commissioned me.”

As in the next letter a princely gift from the Duke of one hundred scudi † is mentioned, it may be assumed that Pierluigi had completed the work and satisfied his patron. During the rest of that year he continued to be deeply engaged in his service, for he himself mentions three masses undertaken at the Duke's request, and Capello refers to others.

* The Duke evidently selected the melodies himself on which he wished certain compositions to be constructed.

† About £125 in present-day value.

From 1580 to 1583 there is a gap in the letters and it is necessary to turn to other sources of information for particulars of Pierluigi's life during these years. Through the Register of Deaths belonging to St. Peter's, we learn that Lucrezia, Pierluigi's wife, after a married life lasting thirty-three years, died and was buried on July 23, 1580, in the Cappella Nuova of St. Peter's. The mother did not therefore long survive the death of her sons. Pierluigi, however, does not appear to have been left entirely alone. His youngest son, Igino, married Virginia Guarnacci in 1577, and in the register of St. Peter's occurs an entry referring to the baptism of their son Tommaso whose godfather was no less a person than Cardinal Sirleto. This member of the Sacred College occupied himself keenly in questions affecting the conservation of the ancient chant in its purity,* which may be taken as a sufficient explanation for his patronage of Pierluigi and his family. But it is to be surmised that the domestic situation was no easy one. Pierluigi had not only lost his beloved wife but the head of his household. As Master of the

* It will be recalled that Sirleto wrote to Cardinal Cervini before he became Marcellus II., on this subject.

Julian Choir he had boys under his care, and a young daughter-in-law with small children—a baby was born only three days after Lucrezia's death—may quite conceivably have lacked the experience and leisure for the management of so complicated a household. Be this as it may, in 1581, Pierluigi married again, choosing a wife suitable to a man of advancing years and failing health. Victoria Dormuli was a rich widow and beyond this little is known of her, the only documents throwing any light on the subject dealing with the business transactions incidental to a prosperous fur business she inherited from her first husband. From this she chiefly, though not entirely, derived her income, and according to a document discovered in recent years, Pierluigi figured in it as her partner until the business was placed in other hands for management. As nothing was known of this second marriage until the end of the nineteenth century, the Abbé Baini, relying on the circumstance that Pierluigi's first marriage was known to be a very happy one, built up a romantic story of his despair, proceeding to give pathetic details of compositions produced under its influence. Obviously Pierluigi's speedy remarriage does not in any way exclude the genuineness of his profound sorrow. No one has the right to gauge the quality of such a grief on grounds like these. All honour to Victoria

Dormuli, who was ready to aid the great musician at so sad a crisis in his history. And before the year was out Death robbed him of his little grandchildren, Angelo's son and daughter, who were left to their grandfather's charge on the remarriage of their young mother. Is there any cause for astonishment that Pierluigi sought to make headway against his misfortunes by building up his life again, or had felt the need of assistance in protecting the two young children in his care ?

CHAPTER IX

IN the year 1581 a new name appears in the annals of Pierluigi's life, that of a man to whose splendid and attractive figure it would not be difficult to write dedicatory epistles con amore. This was the young Duke of Sora, a son born to Gregory XIII. before he entered the priesthood. Tiepolo, the Venetian ambassador at the Papal Court, in a confidential report to his Government, describes him as well-versed in letters, graceful in manners, of a noble and liberal mind, with ability and judgment for anything to which he might apply his powers. In the Colonna Palace, hard by the church of the Santi Apostoli, he and his wife—a daughter of the House of Sforza—lived magnificently; and his entertainments were estimated as among the most brilliant Rome afforded, no light estimation in those days of gorgeous hospitality. The guess may be hazarded that Pierluigi had the direction of the inevitable music at these, for, in a dedication, he speaks of favours received from the Duke who, as was to be expected, would hardly fail to enlist the services of the foremost musician at the Papal Court in organizing those noble fêtes. The Palazzo Colonna was in itself a miniature Court, frequented by all who wished to be in the favour of the Pontiff, and if—as is probable—the Duke shared his father's marked predilection for the society of musicians (a predilection which was actually made a subject of reproach to the Pope in the last years of his Pontificate), the connection may be regarded as not only profitable but adding largely to the amenities of Pierluigi's life. Be this as it may, he dedicated to his young patron a book of motets for four voices, and the first book of madrigali spirituali already mentioned as written for the use of S. Filippo's congregations.

In the following year a fresh volume of masses appeared, dedicated to His Holiness. Of these, four out of seven were copied into the choir-books of the Sistine Chapel under distinctive titles, Pierluigi previously having designated them only by numbers. Missa Prima thus became Lauda Sion; Missa Tertia, Jesu nostra redemptio; while a second Missa Tertia for five voices—the preceding were for four—received the title O magnum mysterium. This mass was already written in 1571, the year of Pierluigi's return to St. Peter's, as is shown by the date worked into the ornamental design of the Q in Qui tollis. Missa Prima has as its basic theme a melody proper to the Feast of Corpus Christi; Missa Tertia, for four voices, the hymn for Ascensiontide, Jesu nostra redemptio; while Missa Tertia for five voices is taken from Pierluigi's motet O magnum mysterium. "Why," it may be asked, "was it necessary to disguise these masses under a numerical nomenclature if, as appears, the origin of their themes was in conformity with the injunctions of the Council of Trent?" There is a reason though one only recently discovered. Missa Quarta conceals an old friend under its non-committal title. It is the second of Pierluigi's masses written on the famous melody "L'homme armé," again a proof that Pierluigi saw no harm in the practice of using secular themes as long as they were so employed that the mere layman had no opportunity of being scandalized thereby.

It is curious to learn, at this time, that notwithstanding his favourable circumstances in Rome, Pierluigi evidently contemplated going to live in Mantua under the Duke's protection. It may be that he was grown restless under the savage blows Fate had dealt him,* and desired to seek fresh scenes, unhaunted by sad memories. At first there is no direct reference to the affair, but it may be inferred, after some preliminaries of which there is no record, that the Duke sent his secretary, Aurelio Zibramonte, to sound Pierluigi on the subject. If so, it was approached in what may be termed the diplomatic manner, for Zibramonte asks Pierluigi to give his opinion on the merits of other musicians, subsequently writing to the Duke as follows :—

“Messer Giovanni da Palestrina discussed with me the project of making Messer Annibale Zoilo your choirmaster and will find out his point of view, and Don Annibale Capello tells me that Palestrina would be ready to serve your Highness, also commending his son who is a good musician, but I do not know the conditions to which he pretends.”

This letter, dated March 26, 1583, was followed by another a fortnight later :—

“Palestrina finds that Zoilo will not leave [Rome] on account of his wife and children and therefore falls back on Messer Luca Marentio, who serves the Cardinal d’Este, and S.S.S. thought of sending him to the King of France, for which reason he would not concede him to the Duke of Ferrara his brother.”

Here are highly interesting references to matters which require more explanation than they receive in the letter. Luca Marenzio—so his name is usually spelt—was not mentioned amongst Pierluigi’s contemporaries in the short account given of these, for he cannot altogether be considered a typical member of the Roman School, but rather as a genius trained in it and finding his own brilliant path later. He takes rank as one of the most important musicians towards the latter decades of the century. Born in the neighbourhood of Brescia about 1550 he was thus a man of thirty-three at this time. As a writer of Church music his motets O quam gloriosum and Hodie Paulus Apostolus are particularly fine examples of a style based on the Palestrinian School ; but as a writer of madrigals he stands so high as to need a niche for himself. In this form of composition he uses chromatic harmonies previously unknown, and though a great quantity of his works have not yet been translated into modern notation, sufficient is in existence to convince the student that Marenzio was little short of three hundred years in advance of his time. This is not, however, the place for the study of so interesting a personality. His reputation at the moment in which Zibramonte wrote to the Duke was already so high that he might well be considered a dangerous rival to Pierluigi himself "who," the letter continues, "affirms that this Marentio is not a better man than Soriano," Pierluigi's pupil, "neither in science, nor as a director of music (in attitudine di governar musici), and therefore counsels your Highness to think of some one else." There is no reason to suspect Pierluigi of insincerity here, nor of undue preference for his pupil, Soriano, who, as has already been pointed out, was a remarkable musician. Marenzio's madrigals were not here in question and as a writer of Church music, his work might fairly be compared with that of other excellent composers of that school, of whom Soriano was a typical example. It seems highly probable that Pierluigi was out of sympathy with Marenzio's secular compositions which, it is even reasonable to suppose, may have struck him as fantastic, revolutionary, almost unintelligible. Verily the old order changeth, giving place to new, and those of the old order often suffer from an inability to grasp the significance of experiments outside their own artistic experience. So much, then, for Marenzio, though the subject is tempting enough. But there remains another reference to a matter of historical interest which affords another instance of the high estimation in which music and musicians were at this time held. The Cardinal d'Este mentioned by Zibramonte was not, of course, Pierluigi's former patron, who had been dead for some years, but a son of Duke Ercole II., brother of the reigning Duke, Alfonso II. This Cardinal, Luigi d'Este, filled the ecclesiastical office of Protector of France, for which reason he was styled Sua Santa Signoria,—abbreviated as the S.S.S. of the letter. This sufficiently explains why he desired to perform the pleasing service of sending His Majesty the King of France such a distinguished musician as Marenzio.

Pierluigi's pupil Soriano was, at this moment, in the Duke of Mantua's service, but it appears to have been in the nature of a temporary appointment which might become permanent ; some such inference may be drawn from Zibramonte's next letter, dated four days later :—

“Messer Giovanni da Palestrina has been to tell me this morning that for the love he bears his pupil Soriano it would displease him if he lost his position in your Highness's service on his account, but being devoted, as he is, to your Highness, does not wish to fail in holding himself ready to serve you, together with his young son aged twenty-two, who has a wife and a little son, and is studying the law, hoping to take his degree as Doctor in a year, after which your Highness will be able to employ him in your service as you may think suitable. I tried to find out what salary he desired, but always with much modesty he replied that he would serve your Highness for nothing if his circumstances permitted. He would be satisfied with what was seemly and desired as much as would provide for himself and his family so that he was relieved from care on their account. Here he has 200 ducats (each of the value of 10 Julii) from the Chapter of St. Peter's for life as long as he serves them. He has a letter from His Holiness on this point according to which he cannot be deprived of this sum during his service. This proceeding has displeased the Chapter and interferes with the privilege of His Holiness to dismiss him at their pleasure.* Besides this, from other sources of income and from casual fees he receives about 50 ducats. He has also a certain income from His Holiness that he hopes will not be taken away from him if he enters your Highness's service. His family numbers seven mouths, namely himself, his wife, his son, his daughter-in-law, the little grandchild, a man-servant, a maid. He wishes your Highness to pay the cost of the journey to Mantua and to house them in such a manner that they may live comfortably."

This highly important letter gives the first opportunity of making an authoritative statement of Pierluigi's income at this time, and its discovery was the first indication of the hitherto unknown fact of his remarriage. Though the value of money constantly changed according to its purchasing power in the sixteenth century, the sum of two hundred ducats which formed Pierluigi's salary from the Chapter of St. Peter's may be reckoned as equal to fifty pounds, at present-day value two hundred and fifty pounds. About a quarter of that sum may be added to it from uncertain sources. The amount of the pension from the Pope's private purse is not specified. These

* Apparently the Chapter were annoyed that the Pope had bound himself to retain Pierluigi's services independently of their will, amounts, which are reckoned at the rate of a little over five times and a half as much, or rather under than over the estimated value according to modern computations, were the reward of his labours in connection with St. Peter's and do not include such items as fees for dedications to patrons, or for professional work elsewhere, for instance, in the Altaemps Chapel, etc., for it can hardly be supposed that these went unremunerated. Nor is there any mention here of income invested in private property, which would naturally remain outside the present discussion. The reference to his son, Igino, in the letter throws much light on that young man's history. There is no allusion elsewhere to his professional calling, though Zibramonte's first letter states he is a good musician. Evidently Pierluigi regarded this as sufficiently important to be worthy of mention. He foresaw for his son a sphere of usefulness in a double capacity at the Mantuan Court. Now that Igino's profession is revealed it goes far to explain the love of litigation characteristic in later days, as well as a certain tendency to sharp practice which, however, defeated its own ends. Once again this letter illustrates Pierluigi's admirable care for his family, his desire to include them in any good fortune he might enjoy. There can be little doubt that this wrecked the project. "Provision for seven mouths," that illuminating phrase, was a heavy addition to the Duke's budget, and William of Mantua was, although a generous patron, a prudent man. In spite of his appreciation and admiration of the great musician, his earnest desire to give to Mantua the best the times afforded, he was careful not to imperil his engagements towards others already in his service by a too lavish expenditure on a new undertaking. So much is shown by the letters during the months of April and May, for those written on behalf of the Duke, while displaying eagerness, ask for a more explicit statement of Pierluigi's wishes regarding salary and expenses, desiring to know whether he is strong enough to bear the strain of Court life, the constant journeys in the Duke's train, the consequent separation from wife and family. To those acquainted with the chronicles of Court festivities in Milan and Ferrara—to mention only two of the numerous Courts throughout Italy celebrated for the splendour of their entertainments—these inquiries will seem pertinent enough. They may even have suggested doubts to Pierluigi himself, at this moment not far removed from sixty and in failing health. The Bishop of Alva, who now acts as go-between, is requested by the Duke to confine the bargain within certain financial limits and to inform Pierluigi that his Highness possesses a house in Mantua where he and his family may live in comfort ; further, that the expenses of the journey will be borne by the Duke. In another letter, from the Duke's secretary, Giaches Wert's name is mentioned, and we learn that he is content with a salary of one hundred scudi, a house, and provision for two mouths ; still, it is evident his Highness is very anxious to persuade Pierluigi, for after a night's reflection, he follows up this letter with another desiring the good Bishop to tell Pierluigi he will undertake to employ the son who is about to receive his doctor's degree, and that his Highness's service, always lucrative, will be made doubly so to one coming from Rome, and thoroughly conversant with ecclesiastical procedure. But the Bishop writes that he has not succeeded in getting a definite statement from Pierluigi, though he hears from a third person, Annibale Capello, that the great musician will not leave Rome without a yearly stipend of two hundred ducats, the sum he already receives from the Chapter of St. Peter, not forgetting the provision for seven mouths. This constitutes a deadlock. The correspondence here breaks off and the rest is silence. Whether the Duke desired Annibale Capello to tell Pierluigi that his terms were too high, whether a letter from Pierluigi, withdrawing from the transaction, is lost, the net result was that he remained in Rome. Possibly other considerations had their weight.

Rooted deep in the life of the Papal Court, Pierluigi was no longer young, Mantua was far from Rome and friends, far, too, from his property both here and in Palestrina ; his heart may very well have failed him before the final step. In any case, from whichever side the decision came the negotiations left no bitterness behind. The correspondence proceeds on the old lines of mutual respect and appreciation. After all, who could regret that Pierluigi remained in Rome, the faithful servant of St. Peter's, head of that grand school of composition recognized and admired by all? Something in weight and dignity he would assuredly have lost as the Duke's choirmaster, even were the material advantages greater. Rome moulded him, crowned him, if sometimes the crown was of thorns, and the time was coming when her sacred dust would mingle with his, the imperishable part of him remaining to pulsate through the mighty church and to the summit of the great dome that her musician did not live to see completed. Considerations such as these may very well have stood for something in the abandonment of a plan, it may be, born of restlessness, the outcome of his sorrows, of the daily frictions and annoyances which attend the life of every great artist.

CHAPTER X

BETWEEN the years 1582 and 1584 details are again lacking of Pierluigi's life. But in 1583 there is just one glimpse of him, for the Company of Rome—so it was styled—came into existence, a society created, it appears from the evidence, to assist that scheme, dear to the heart of every Roman, of ousting the foreigner. In this object it obviously co-operated with the Julian Choir, partly founded for a similar purpose. This conclusion is based on two facts : that the Pontifical Choir, composed largely of foreigners, fought it tooth and nail, passing a resolution condemning any of its members to a fine who had dealings with the Company of Rome, and that the list of the Company consisted exclusively of native musicians.* On this ground an explanation of the circumstance that Vittoria the Spaniard was not made a member may be sought. The quarrel between the Pontifical Choir and the Company of Rome did not endure, for already in 1589 a collection of madrigals issued by the latter and edited by Anerio, there described as Master of the Choir, included amongst the compositions of Pelestino (sic) Dragoni, Soriano, Marenzio, Stabile, Giovanelli, Bernardino Nanino and others, works by three members of the Pontifical Choir. The publication, by the way, was quaintly entitled le gioie, or the jewels.

* Thus were the foundations laid of a national school which, in a reorganized form, exists to-day as the Academy of St. Cecilia.

From 1584 onwards the thread may be picked up once more as there are two letters from Pierluigi to the Duke of Mantua, the first of which, dated August 27, begins: "The boundless obligations I have towards your Highness," and proceeds to offer him a copy of the "new book of motets on the Song of Solomon." These magnificent compositions had a complete and instant success. Bains surpasses himself in their panegyric and with reason, for the Master is here a creator of a new species of composition. It must always be borne in mind that if a modern composer wishes to set this or that text to music he has an inexhaustible fount of musical types to choose from, proceeding to adorn it by the light of any originality in himself. He may, indeed, accomplish his task in a form having all the appearance of a new idiom; it will not be long, however, before the critics have discovered this or that analogy; this or that derivation from other composers ; or, failing that, the use of some ancient theory of sound or scale. In the sixteenth century it was otherwise. Composers, then, were not compelled to choose between a more or less marked plagiarism or eccentricity. They were groping their way step by step along a beautiful strange road ; led spiritually, with the better expression of the Church's meaning as their guiding star. In the preface Pierluigi speaks of genere alacriore—of a more animated species. There was already a breath of this spirit in the madrigali spirituali, hardly ecclesiastical, certainly not secular ; rather—warm, human, expressive. But here he is aided by the quality of the text and the marvellous imagery of the Eastern King's poem, liberating a quality of expressiveness which the reticence of the Church musician had previously held in reserve. There must be no misunderstanding here. There was no attempt at realism, for the Bible was still the Sacred Book, not having yet become the gold-mine for the scene-painter, the playwright, the musician. To-day, danced to a chromatic tone-scheme which has little or nothing in common with the music of the East, the story of the Baptist and the daughter of Herodias furnishes a stage-setting for the newest dancer or for the display of the latest harmonic effect. Joseph provides a study of erotic emotion ; Samson the spectacle of the strong man entangled in the siren's toils. Already Solomon's beautiful poem is transferred to the film of a cinematograph, possibly with music illustrative of "The beloved skipping upon the hills," or "The little foxes spoiling the grapes." Without dwelling further on the consequent loss and degradation, Pierluigi's music may be recommended to those who grieve at such a state of things. In these exquisite motets, written before the operatic idea had taken root in human consciousness, is to be found the one tolerable medium for conveying a passionate symbolism that only man in the beauty of a pastoral simplicity might dare to use. Not a vestige of the dramatic or the sensuous is there, but a longing so etherealized, so rare that it forms a truly wonderful expression of soaring idealism. The music interprets an inner ecstasy not to be reached through the medium of words. Here is something more than the old Platonic definition of the movement of sounds so as to reach the soul for the education of it in virtue; much more than the Renaissance ideal of pure beauty, for it adorns these conceptions with spirituality.

In the letter accompanying the gift of this volume to the Duke Pierluigi communicates the fact that he has another work in hand. This was probably his fifth book of motets, published in that year by Gardano of Rome, and dedicated to the young Cardinal-prince, Andrea Bathory, nephew of the famous and knightly Stephen, King of Poland. This young man, of extremely pious disposition, was sent by his uncle on an embassy to the Papacy late in 1583. Delighting in music, he naturally sought out Pierluigi, who was at that moment in full enjoyment of the fame and acclamation his motets on the Song of Solomon brought him. Delighted with the pleasant, graceful manners of the young prince, Pierluigi forthwith desired to pay him the compliment of a dedication before his departure from Rome, and hurried this fifth book of motets through the press, adding compositions not originally intended in the scheme. Thus Surge Sancte Dei de habitatione tua and Ambula Sancte Dei ad locum predestinatum are motets belonging to the year 1580; written for certain solemn festivities which took place in connection with the transference of the relics of St. Gregory Nazianzen. While Bathory was in Rome Gregory presented him with the Cardinal's hat, for which reason his stay was prolonged beyond his original intention, and Pierluigi therefore had the pleasure of presenting the new volume in person. It was a high compliment to pay, for among the contents of this book, surely worthy of the title given by the Company of Rome to their firstfruits, are to be found such "jewels" as the motet for Ascension-tide, Tempus est ut revertar and the exquisite Salve

Regina. The flummery of the dedication reads in sharp contrast with the high morality of these noble works, but these things must be accepted with philosophy. Disparities in station and rank yawned wider then than now; though kings might, and did, pick up the paint brushes of geniuses, though an amazing liberty of speech was permitted between Pope and craftsman, though poetasters and dramatists enjoyed nothing less than public adulation, the barrier was insurmountable and all were at the mercy of a more or less arbitrary will. There were always bold spirits whom not even a dungeon could subdue; still, for the most part, the artist, intent on securing a quiet and safe life for the prosecution of his studies, surrounded himself with patrons as great and as powerful as circumstances permitted, and addressed them in language as obsequious as their ratio of usefulness was high. Before presuming to condemn Pierluigi for following the custom of his time, it may be well to ask ourselves if the spirit which prompted these courtier-like effusions is as dead now as were to be wished? More adroit it may be, less servile it certainly is, as the sense of humour has developed. Pomposity and long-windedness are elbowed out by rapid locomotion; "Your Highness's most obleeged" is as superannuated as the blunderbuss on Hampstead Heath. The man of genius and no cash must find other and more subtle ways of achieving that union between capital and labour which forms the desired goal, but the probabilities are that had he lived in the sixteenth century he would not have found the slightest inconvenience in comparing his patron to Phœbus Apollo, such being the custom, and would have meant no more by it than the more discreet and self-respecting phrases in usage now.

Another letter to the Duke of Mantua is in existence for the year following. Evidently accompanying compositions, not specified, it is interesting on account of a phrase Pierluigi employs there—a reference to himself as quasi senili, “getting old”; a reminder that he is now fifty-nine and stands at the beginning of his last decade. Nevertheless these were years yielding some of his noblest compositions. In the same letter he makes a playful reference to himself as “il Palestina,” showing that this quaint variation of his name at the hands of the Duke’s secretaries had not escaped him.

Earlier in this year * Gregory XIII.’s pontificate came to an end. It was one of stirring incidents, such as the war with the Turks, the question of the Huguenots, the dispute over the jurisdiction of the Church; events in which, as a loyal Churchman, Pierluigi certainly took deep interest. The inevitable political and social unrest attending the death of the Head of Christendom, the accompanying ceremonies—a matter of personal import to the Master of the Julian Chapel—to which by this time he was well accustomed,* the uncertainty attending the election of the new Pope; all these factors indubitably affected his life and work at this time. At one phase in the proceedings of the subsequent conclave it seemed not unlikely that Cardinal Sirleto would be elected as Gregory's successor. From his well-known interest in Church music it is to be presumed that such an election would have been favourable to the musicians, but the tide turned in the direction of Cardinal Montalto, who, "elected as an old man threw away his crutch, and he who had before pretended incapacity, disease, old age, and an almost timid complaisance was then at once made active, vigorous, and haughty, and began to exhibit his unheard-of ferocity."† Unfortunately for those who prefer a picturesque tale, this account is as fantastic as that of Pierluigi's start in life as a beggar-boy,‡ the truth being that Sixtus V. was "a man in good health, active and full of life; nay, that he was still so vigorous and in the full force of his years, is adduced as one of the motives of his election"; an interesting instance of varying points of view.

On the occasion when Sixtus made his ceremonial entry in St. Peter's it is on record that a mass was sung composed expressly for the occasion by Pierluigi, who had chosen for his theme the subject from his motet with the title Tu es Pastor ovium; but the choice of words was not sufficient to ensure its approval by Sixtus, who is reported to have compared the music unfavourably with that of the Missa Papae Marcelli. Whether or no this statement can be relied upon, at all events Pierluigi was not dissatisfied with his mass, for he included it shortly before his death in a volume of others. If his enemies rejoiced over the Pope's adverse criticism, their triumph was short-lived. Tu es Pastor ovium was followed by a masterpiece of the first order. This is the famous mass Assumpta est Maria, of which it is hard to speak in sober terms. From the opening phrases of the Kyrie the elevation of spirit, suavity, virgin quality of sound, grip the hearer and convey the instant conviction of greatness. It has been remarked that Pierluigi must have had a special veneration for the Queen of Heaven. Certain is it that in all text relating to our Lord's mother he employs what may be described as a certain atmospheric quality, a purity, clarity of tone in remarkable harmony with the attributes of the Virgin-mother. An analysis of the mechanical means by which he achieves this reveals only a certain grouping of the voices, an inclination to employ the higher registers of these, thus creating an open, pulsating effect, very sweet and calm. In the Gloria he illustrates the passage Tu solus altissimus with an ascending passage culminating on the final word (in the part assigned to the first tenor) with the triumphant sweep upwards of an octave. The satisfying effect of this simple device is heightened by the apparently ingenuous scale-passage down which the voices proceed to the final "Amen." Its simplicity recalls the work of Fra Angelico, the more subtle in its power over the imagination by reason of its inherent quality of apparent candour. Attention may be called to this mass as a remarkable instance of Pierluigi's method of dividing the voices antiphonally. An instance occurs in the opening bars—in the first Kyrie—where two sopranos and the first tenor are grouped against contralto, second tenor, and bass. In this way he obtains that contrast of timbre which is so extraordinarily effective in a great space where resonance has free play. The first performance of this chef d'œuvre was on August 15, 1585, the Festival of the Assumption. It is said that so much haste was required to get it finished that Pierluigi left insufficient time for the copying of the voice-parts, resorting, at the last moment, to the printing-press from which, in five days, the first impression was issued, without date, composer's, or publisher's name. The ceremonies of the festa took place as usual in S. Maria Maggiore, and Sixtus is reported to have left the church smiling, remarking that the new mass could be from no other pen but Pierluigi's, an amende honorable perhaps if necessarily obvious. One of the results of this triumph may be identified in a curious affair, the threads of which are difficult to unravel. A few months later another attempt was made to include Pierluigi among the members of the Pontifical Choir, this time as Maestro della Cappella. Did Pierluigi desire it, or was the initiative to be sought elsewhere? Did Sixtus wish that the lustre of this great musician's name should be added to his official choir? The accounts are so deficient and so confused that it is impossible to arrive at a conclusion. The probabilities point to indiscreet action on the part of Pierluigi's admirers, roused, it may be, to enthusiasm by his latest masterpiece, for it is almost inconceivable that Pierluigi, who knew his Rome, should have placed himself in a position to be flouted by the Pontifical Choir. Here are the facts. The project was set on foot by a person unknown. A certain Monsignor Antonio Boccapadule undertook the office of go-between, and not the least remarkable part of the affair is that he himself was Master of the Choir, the very person, it might have been thought, interested in keeping Pierluigi out. This may be regarded as an argument for the theory advanced by some, that Sixtus himself had a hand in the matter, for who so well able to compensate Boccapadule for his self-abnegation? At first he proceeded in a diplomatic manner, canvassing the younger members of the choir. On finding that one of these, a certain Tommaso Benigni, was in favour of the scheme he commissioned this personage to sound the other members. His enthusiasm for the matter in hand appears to have misled him: possibly, indeed, the choir was backward in giving an opinion, not desiring without strong support to advance into the open. Benigni took this caution for assent, and from his account of the matter considered himself justified in calling a meeting at his house. To his astonishment opposition of the most determined character manifested itself, the members of the choir objecting—thus did history repeat itself—that Pierluigi was a layman and married. Boccapadule did not at once lose courage, possibly thinking the opposition would die down. This was not the case. A few days later a meeting was called at the Chapter-house, all the singers being present, and not only was the proposal quashed, but Benigni was subjected to a severe reprimand and to a fine for introducing a measure he well knew to be contrary to the fundamental laws of his corporation. But according to Baini the matter did not rest here. Taking the view that Sixtus himself desired Pierluigi's election but did not wish to appear as prime mover in the project, knowing full well that it was not in accordance with the regulations—the Abbé proceeds to tell us that the Pope forthwith dismissed four singers in excess of the stipulated number, as if desiring to give an emphatic hint that such sticklers for the strict letter of the law as the Pontifical singers revealed themselves to be should set their house in order. True or not, one fact may with certainty be established. Shortly afterwards the official title of "Composer to the Pontifical Choir" was formally bestowed by the Pope on Pierluigi. This may be taken as a reparation for a painful affront, for it can scarcely be doubted that the affair was intensely disagreeable to the great musician. Thus his standing was defined and, though not actually a member, his new title gave him the coveted official position in the celebrated choir. As a coda to the proceedings, Sixtus, in the following year, issued a Bull confirming the pretensions of the Choir to elect their own Master from amongst themselves—one with fifteen years' service behind him, or failing that, the next in order of seniority. This might certainly be advanced as an argument against Bains's account that Sixtus had something to do with the scheme to make Pierluigi Maestro della Cappella Pontificale. In any case the singers vindicated their attitude and prevented any further attempt to tamper with their statutes.

Possibly in celebration of his new appointment, Pierluigi presented the Choir with two masses at this time: Salve Regina for five voices and Ecce ego Joannes for six. Ambros relates that little care was taken of the original manuscripts; they were not, as was customary, copied into the great choir-books, and had not the choirmaster Orfei, after Pierluigi's death, put them into a safe place they would have been lost. As this cannot be attributed to ignorance it must be set down to jealousy of a peculiarly petty kind. If the world could have afforded to lose any of Pierluigi's works it would certainly not have been that most noble work Ecce ego Joannes, for although presenting points of contrast with the style of Missa Papae Marcelli and Assumpta est Maria, it reveals no diminution of strength, but rather a ripeness of conception, a philosophic cast of thought which stamp it as one of the greatest of his masses. It is evident that Pierluigi might dare to style himself quasi senili, for his intellectual vigour was worthy the envy of younger men.

His genius was of that order which time only ripens, and, until the end, there was to be no faltering in the stately procession of his works. The curious story is fairly typical of experiences common to every great man. Indeed, it may be argued that without these petty vexations fame cannot be considered as secure. Jealousy, conscious or unconscious, welcomes every opportunity of diminishing the success of a rival, and only great souls can resist its promptings or withstand its attacks. But the surmise may be permitted that Pierluigi had already acquired that serenity born of the conviction that brain and intellect have reached the goal for which every genius strives, that self-expression which brings its own reward.

CHAPTER XI

PIERLUIGI'S connection with the House of Gonzaga came to an end with the death of the Duke in the year 1587. His relations with William of Mantua had never been anything but creditable to them both ; on the one side the connoisseur capable of appreciating the greatness of the artist, on the other a dignified service for the favours received. Flattering as the phrases are in Pierluigi's dedications to his patron there is a ring of sincerity, for the artist perceives him capable of discrimination, and for that reason well worth serving. A study of the Mantuan records shows that the Duke's love of the arts was no mere accident. Very early in its history the Court of Mantua established its reputation as a centre of cultivation and learning, and William was not the first of his house to interest himself in the theories of composition. Amongst the archives for the year 1553 there exists an account of the performance of Ariosto's I Suppositi, the entr'actes for which were composed by Cardinal Ercole Gonzaga,* regent of Mantua during Duke William's minority. Unfortunately none of the Duke's compositions, up to the present moment, have been traced, but entries in the Court accounts referring to the sending of music-paper from Venice, from the year 1560 onwards, correspond with the particulars of the Duke's compositions as revealed in his letters and serve to indicate this as no temporary whim but a serious and ardent study, to which he particularly applied himself (according to a statement in one of the letters) on those villegiature during the summer months which the notoriously unhealthy climate of Mantua rendered at this time imperative. In 1583 he sent a set of madrigals to the press, "not," as he quaintly explains, "through ambition, but that it be not labour lost," former works, it seems, having been lost, "and," he continues, "so as to be able to enjoy the fruits of past industry." Here is the measure of the man, intellectually humble, discerning, not to be cajoled by courtiers, conscious how hard it was for a prince to receive the benefit of honest criticism. These published madrigals are doubtless those of which he sent a copy to the Court of the Estes, also in the year 1583, and of which Ludovico

* It is truly astonishing that this most powerful Cardinal, who had a finger in every diplomatic pie in Europe, yet found time for the art of composition.

Agostino, its choirmaster and composer, writes as follows : "The madrigals were sung in very good company, and they caused every one who heard them to marvel, not only through their excellence but because they appeared worthy of imitation." The latter part of the sentence may be taken as implying a certain amount of originality on the part of the princely composer, or it may be a reference to that bello stiftio and spirito vivo alle parole of which Pierluigi speaks in the letter, already quoted, of March 3, 1570. The Prince was noted for his generosity, and not alone to his dependants, one of his last acts being the gift of his Abbey of Fellonico to the Pontifical Choir, to be used by them as a place of relaxation and repose, the income from which was to remain at their disposal ; a practical instance of his interest in all matters affecting the musical portion of the Roman Liturgy. While it is impossible to regret that Pierluigi's life was not spent in the smaller world of the Mantuan Court, it is highly probable that it would have been calmer, freer from anxiety. If, however, the point be considered objectively it will be seen that here is, after all, only another reason for satisfaction that Pierluigi remained in Rome ; what great artist was ever the better for freedom from those very cares which act as a stimulus to his genius ?

The Mantuan correspondence continues to within the last month of the Duke's life. The final letter, dated July 6, 1587, was from Pierluigi, written to introduce a certain Stefano Ugeri, a Cremonese, whose name is to be found in the Papal Choir lists from 1585 to 1591. He was the bearer of unnamed compositions from Pierluigi's pen, and the letter further informs the Duke that Ugeri is an inmate of his house, an interesting detail apparently warranting the assumption that Pierluigi admitted other musicians to his board beyond those he received in his official capacity as Master of the Julian Choir.* Or it may be read as a proof that he did, as Baini maintains, live in the choir-house at the entrance to the atrium of the old basilica, ostensibly intended for the Julian Choir but possibly capable of housing more than the regulation number of musicians attached to that foundation. Meagre as the reference is it is very welcome, for so little information can be gleaned as to Pierluigi's domestic circumstances. Thus this highly interesting correspondence closes, and Duke William of Mantua passes out of Pierluigi's life.

For one more detail of this year we turn to the archives of Palestrina, where it still remains on record that Pierluigi added yet another to the vineyards he possessed there.* The guess may be hazarded that no summer passed without a sojourn in that place of cool and fragrant breezes so conveniently situated for the long villeggiature essential to all persons residing in beautiful but insalubrious Rome. A tradition, indeed, exists that he spent much time there, honoured by his townsmen and surrounded by kinsfolk. A few of the latter may be established with certainty, the organist (since 1571) of S. Agapito, Cesare Vecchia,† with others of that name; Pierluigi's sister Palma, married to a burgher of the town in 1562, her celebrated brother, as head of the family, providing the indispensable dowry. Until 1581 his two grandchildren, Angelo's son and daughter, during their pathetically short lives, were much with their maternal grandfather, Pierluigi paying for their keep. Near enough for frequent visits, far enough to provide a pleasant haven of rest from the busy Roman life, the musician's birthplace must often have been in his thoughts. The lovely chains of hills around it were typical of those contrapuntal chains from which he wove his suave and ecstatic melodies; the glories of a dying sunset over the Campagna of those melting, sighing closes to a Benedictus or

* A similar purchase is recorded under the date of 1584.

† The Vecchias were relations of his first wife, Lucrezia. In 1566 he placed two boys of that name, his nephews, in the Roman seminary.

Agnus Dei. Beauty enveloped him here, he had but to interpret its message—interpret, yet something more. Is not genius the critical faculty in man born of that Spirit which breathed over the beauty of the Creation and “saw that it was good”? Surely the “eyes to see” went with the “ears to hear” in Pierluigi’s artist-nature so that he rested better in these surroundings than elsewhere. With the Psalmist he might have said, “O what great troubles and adversities hast Thou showed me, yet didst thou turn and refresh me, yea, and broughtest me from the deep of the earth again.” And he could well have added, “Thou hast brought me to great honour and comforted me on every side.” Where the capacity for suffering is great so is that for joy, and it is pleasant to think that, like a patriarch amongst his vines and olives, Pierluigi in Palestrina found this true.

His creative activity during the next few years was truly remarkable. It was as if he realized that his time was getting short, and wished to provide the Church he served so indefatigably with compositions for every conceivable ecclesiastical function. A fresh set of Lamentations, Magnificats, hymns, litanies, and offertories composed for the whole of the Church year succeeded each other. The inexhaustible riches of his imagination were never more apparent than in his treatment of the ancient plain-song melodies forming the basis of these volumes, than in his freedom and variety within the limits of a litany, hymn, or Magnificat. One word as to the Lamentations. These, the only set published during his lifetime, were dedicated to the Pope, and this dedication is known to all students of Pierluigi's life, as giving rise to suppositions which, in the light of recent discovery, no longer seem to be justified. In it he complains bitterly of his poverty, the basis of Baini's view as to the bad state of his finances. What, then, was its true explanation? Sixtus, a man of forceful character, was certainly not to be hoodwinked by pleas of poverty designed to open his purse-strings, and nothing we know of Pierluigi warrants such a theory, though it has been freely advanced. Probably Haberl is right when he surmises that the great composer was thinking not only of the splendid volumes which Orlandus Lassus, and Vittoria were able to bring out, but also of the large quantity of his still unpublished works, not only unpublished during his lifetime, but even remaining so until the end of the last century. In this connection it is significant that not until his marriage to a woman of considerable means was he enabled to bring out fine editions. This fact speaks for itself. After all, words are relative, and Pierluigi was given to a certain picturesque expression of his experiences, as may be deduced already from the dedication to his first book of masses (inscribed to Julius III.), and from his exaggerated repentance for those secular compositions so innocuous to modern eyes. In this instance he may have had hopes of persuading Sixtus into ordering a collected Vatican edition of the works of the "Composer to the Pontifical Choir," and if so, there was nothing extravagant in such an aspiration ; but the Pope, whose splendid architectural schemes were cribbed, cabined, and confined by the depressed state of the Pontifical exchequer, and who was notoriously in difficulties with regard to the funds for the completion of the new basilica, remained deaf to the hint, and Pierluigi gained nothing by his outburst.

Sixtus died in August. The five years of his active reign brought about many changes in Rome, and Pierluigi was now able to walk into the new cathedral and marvel at the mighty enterprise. Here is a contemporary account of its state at the moment of the Pope's death. Though still unfinished, "the great dome and the smaller dome, and also the enclosure which they call the greater chapel, together with other smaller chapels, and the whole building of the new church dedicated to St. Peter the Apostle" were in existence.* This was the great fact of Pierluigi's life and, in some aspects, must have appeared more astounding then than now, as there was no façade to conceal the extraordinary size of its proportions as it rose, symmetrical and dominating, from the mass of scaffolding and half-ruined buildings a portent of the new epoch.

Another period of uncertainty and unrest followed the great Pope's death. His successor, Urban VII., did not survive his election more than a fortnight. A fresh conclave was immediately called, but an immense time was consumed in deliberations, and it was not before December 5 that Cardinal Ugo Buoncompagni of Bologna assumed the tiara as Gregory XIV. Gorgeous ceremonial, stately Requiem, alternating with the street-rows which invariably attended the election of the Pontiff, Te Deums and shouts of Evviva il Papa centred around the spot where Pierluigi had his dwelling—namely, the precincts of the Vatican—from which he concluded in this year the purchase of a vineyard in the neighbourhood of Rome.* Unfortunately, the document which substantiates this statement merely states "in his house by St. Peter's," so we are no wiser than we were before. Earlier in the year he again added to his possessions in Palestrina, buying a garden, stable, and certain plots of land.

One of Gregory XIV.'s first official acts affected

* Haberl.

Pierluigi pleasantly enough—the augmentation of the salaries of the Pontifical Choir, amongst whom was included their Composer. Just before this, a fifth book of masses made its appearance, containing the exquisite little Iste Confessor and the equally well-known Æterna Christi munera. It was dedicated to Duke William of Bavaria,* the generous patron of Lassus. There is no record of any acknowledgment from the Duke of this dedication, which was possibly prompted by a desire on Pierluigi's part to show himself in friendly rivalry with Lassus. Once again a mass may be mentioned constructed on a secular theme, Nasce la gioia mia. Baini is at great pains to explain this away, dwelling on the fact that Lassus had done the same thing, but, as has already been pointed out, Pierluigi was indifferent to the letter of the law if the substance was respected; relying on his skill in transforming the material. Immediately after the appearance of this volume he brought out the Magnificats already referred to, dedicated to Gregory XIV. They appeared only a few days before that Pontiff's death, which occurred on October 15, 1591.

The events of the previous year now repeated themselves. Innocent IX. was elected, only to die on the last day but one of the year. A conclave sat throughout the whole of January, at the end of which time Cardinal Ippolito Aldobrandini was chosen, and seated himself on the Papal throne as Clement VIII., bringing about the curious coincidence that Pierluigi's life was spanned between the reigns of Clement VII. and Clement VIII. No fresh works were issued from the press during this year, for which Bains accounts by an illness, though on what evidence does not appear. In the following year the afore-mentioned Offertories and two volumes of Litanies were published, the first of these dedicated to a new patron, a Frenchman of noble family, the Abbé de Baume, a fervent admirer of the Master at this period, who gave him cause for warm expressions of gratitude. Simultaneously another patron appears, the young Cardinal Pietro Aldobrandini, a nephew of the Pope, who had been trained in that order of Oratorians which owed its foundation to S. Filippo. To this young man Pierluigi dedicated his sixth book of masses, containing Dies sanctificatus; In te Domine speravi; his second mass with the title Sine Nomine, concealing a fresh employment of a secular theme "Je suis deshéritée"; Quam pulchra es—for four voices—and Dilexi quoniam, for five. While these were yet in the press Pierluigi dedicated a book of madrigali spirituali to the wife of Ferdinando de' Medici, Grand Duke of Tuscany, who, originally a Cardinal, succeeded on the death of his brother to the Grand Duchy, and, relinquishing his Cardinalate, married, never having taken vows.

These are the last works of which Pierluigi actually superintended the publication, though a seventh book of masses was already sent to be printed when he was seized with violent illness. This was an attack of pleurisy on January 26, 1594, from which his enfeebled constitution was unable to rally. Baini gives many touching details of these last sad days, of which, however, no corroboration can be found. That Pierluigi was, as he asserts, supported during his illness by his friend S. Filippo Neri has only probability in its favour, but if so, he was in the best of hands. He who had instituted the Order for the contemplation of celestial things by means of musical harmonies could understand, could help, as no other. And when the light grew dim and the world receded, surely the dying musician heard in the gathering darkness harmonies more supernal, more ravishing, than any finding their way to earth through his brain and hand—"the voices of harpers harping with their harps; and they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders; and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth."

The boy-genius from the Sabine hills had done his work. Step by step, emerging from obscurity to fame, he bore music aloft and taught it to express all that the tongue dare not utter, because such emotion, such ecstasy, is too great for words defiled by common use. Now silence was there.

CHAPTER XII

PIERLUIGI was buried, according to custom, on the day he died. His body was enclosed in a plain coffin with a leaden plate, on which was inscribed—

JOANNES PETRUS ALOYSIUS PRAENESTINUS, MUSICÆ PRINCEPS.

That the funeral rites were performed with all possible honour and dignity can be established from contemporary accounts. Here is one from the Puntatore or Registrar of the Pontifical Choir—

“February 2, 1594.—This morning died the most excellent musician, Signor Giovanni Pierluigi, our dear companion, and Maestro di Cappella at St. Peter’s Church, whither his funeral was attended not only by all the musicians of Rome, but by an infinite concourse of people, when Libera me Domine was sung by the whole College.”

Another account adds the detail that Libera me Domine was sung to his setting, a five-part psalm for three choirs.* According to Baini, the distance from the choir-school being so short, the coffin was first carried round the Borgo, thus giving sufficient space for the marshalling of the long procession, divided into three sections by the chanting choirs. It is to be regretted that the Puntatore did not give more details, if only for the reason that the mere enumeration of names would have served to supply certain deficiencies in the life-histories of some of the best-known of these musicians of Rome. For instance, did Vittoria, he who loved the dead musician so greatly as to fashion his clothing on his, follow the Master? Was Marenzio there? or was he still in the Court of Poland, a prized and honoured guest? But though these questions must remain unanswered, there is enough to show it was a great funeral pageant; the bier borne high on stalwart shoulders, between lines of sandalled friars grasping dripping, flaring candles and chanting the Prayers for the Dead as they go; the Pontifical choir; the Julian choir; the "Company of Rome," mourning their brightest "jewel"; a great concourse of friends—S. Filippo certainly amongst these, with the last sad scenes at the bedside fresh in his mind; the crowd, made up of every conceivable element; the Swiss guards (in the picturesque dress designed for them by Michelangelo) keeping order—difficult enough in these narrow streets of the Borgo, but easier as the long procession breaks into the great space of the piazza. Here the voices of the singers would achieve their greatest effect, supported by the impressive tolling of St. Peter's bells celebrating, with mournful clang, the passing of their colleague in the service of the Sanctuary, on his final progress to the ancient basilica.

Libera me Domine de morte aeterna in die illa tremenda, the beautiful mournful chant was Pierluigi's last prayer as his body descended to the dust.

In the Liber Mortuorum Parochiae S. Peter de urbe inceptus die prima Januarii 1545—that is to say, the parish-book of interments in the Church of St. Peter, the following entry occurs: A di 2 Feb. 1594 Messer Gio. Lui. da Palestrina maestro di cappella di S. Pietro sepolto alla cappella nova. This perfectly plain statement in appearance conceals a mystery, for at the present moment no one knows where the body of Pierluigi rests. For this reason: when Julius II. (1503) determined to build a magnificent tomb for himself he abandoned his first idea of adding a chapel to the existing church which, it was found, was in a crumbling condition, and decided to carry out the scheme favoured by his predecessor Nicholas V. of constructing an entirely new edifice. His first act was to build a transverse wall shutting off a little more than half the basilica; the larger half being known in future as the basilica nuova or new church, the smaller half, which continued to be used for its sacred purposes as before, as the basilica vecchia or old church. In the basilica nuova all the ancient chapels were demolished and the bones of those buried there transferred to a recently discovered vault under the round chapel of St. Petronilla, formerly outside the walls of ancient St. Peter's, but now included in the scheme of the building about to be erected. In Paul III.'s reign (1534) in consequence of the collapse of a wall in the old building, the Sacrament-altar was reinstated in the chapel of St. Simon and St. Jude, situated between the fifth and sixth columns of the old basilica which the authorities proceeded to adorn very richly with precious marbles, paintings and gilding. From henceforth this chapel was known as the Cappella Nuova or New Chapel. There Pierluigi was buried.* In the subsequent reign of Paul V. (1605) it was decreed that the old church (basilica vecchia) should forthwith be taken down, and therefore the Sacrament-altar was transferred once more; this time to the other side of the transverse wall, the basilica nuova, where the finished chapel erected by Gregory XIII., and for that reason known as the Gregorian Chapel, was ready to receive it. The bodies of St. Simon and St.

* His wife, Lucrezia, was also buried in the Cappella Nuova.

Jude were transferred to a chapel prepared for them on the left side of the new cathedral on the site of the former chapel of St. Petronilla which now received the name Chapel of St. Simon and St. Jude. While engaged in the necessary excavations the workmen found another vault or receptacle in the neighbourhood of the first and to this all the bones and coffins left in the basilica vecchia were now brought, amongst them, it is supposed, those of Pierluigi. The vergers to-day point with certainty to a space in front of the present altar of St. Simon and St. Jude as Pierluigi's grave ; but when this spot was opened in conformity with certain investigations carried out in 1914,* no coffin of the Musicae Princeps was found. If it be considered that twelve years had already elapsed since Pierluigi was buried in the Cappella nuova of the basilica vecchia, that he was moved with a vast quantity of other remains to his new resting-place, and by workmen, it is not altogether a matter of surprise that this doubt exists ! It was largely a contractor's job, not necessarily implying any lack of order or decency—though there are historical instances where the results have been equally unfortunate ; as for example: the body of Pope Urban VI., tossed out of its sarcophagus so that this receptacle might be filled with water for moistening the mortar employed in the new building of St. Peter's ; or—a case very much nearer our own time—of Mozart thrown into a common grave without even a friend standing by to mark the site.

To return once more to Pierluigi's funeral ceremonies. On February 14 a Requiem Mass was performed to his memory, sung in the chapel of S. Maria del Soccorso in the basilica nuova ; this was the chapel to which the body of St. Gregory Nazianzen had been transferred with so much pomp in 1580, the occasion on which Pierluigi composed the two motets included later in the volume dedicated to Cardinal Andreas Bathory. If, therefore, pilgrims to the tomb of the great musician are foiled in their pious purpose, they may instead cross the great nave to the Chapel of the Madonna del Soccorso and reconstruct for themselves this last act of devotion to Pierluigi's memory.

The farewell mention of Pierluigi's name in the Choir-books concerns the final payment to his son and heir, Igino, of his monthly salary. Shortly afterwards the book which Pierluigi had already delivered to the printers—the seventh volume of masses—appeared, with a dedication to Clement VIII. penned by Igino. Under the date March 1 he informs His Holiness that his father charged him, during the last moments of his life, with the publication of all his remaining manuscripts ; that it was his intention to fulfil this charge as his means gave him opportunity, in which filial duty he humbly hoped for the assistance of the Holy Father.

It cannot be denied that the character of Igino is subsequently shown in anything but a favourable light, as that of a man devoted, at any cost, to the task of making money. At the same time, to describe him as an "unprincipled scoundrel," a "wild and worthless man," is to stretch the facts to breaking point. The tangled skein of the Graduale reappears to confuse the evidence against him, and it becomes exceedingly difficult to distinguish facts from mere accusations. Before giving an account of these transactions it is only fair to suggest that part of Igino's unworthy conduct may have been actuated by a sentiment of resentment against the Vatican authorities, prompting him to dispose of his father's manuscripts outside Rome rather than have any further dealings with them. While, however, going so far in his defence, it would be easy to find harder terms for his bad management of his father's affairs and for the little consideration he showed for his father's posthumous dignity. For this it is impossible to forgive him.

A few months before Pierluigi's death, he was approached by a certain Leonardo Parasoli, who invented a form of musical type, of unusually large size, in which he proposed to print a revision of the Gradual and Antiphonary. In this scheme he desired to enlist Pierluigi's services, not only for the sake of his great reputation but as a means of persuading the Vatican to countenance the proceeding which the Medicean printing house (of which Parasoli was an employé) was to carry through. Apparently Pierluigi showed no disinclination to forward the enterprise, for which he was offered the handsome sum of 800 sc. There was the already completed work lying by, the whole of the Temporale, useless since the abandonment of the former project undertaken at the instance of Gregory XIII., and probably a quantity of half-completed material; rendering the present one a very different proposition from that made earlier, which entailed an enormous amount of research and time—expenditure without any corresponding pecuniary advantage. But death intervened. How much of the work was already completed it is impossible to say. Igino now resolved to turn the affair to his advantage. He began by asking twice as much as his father had done, and in order to do this he obviously represented the work as finished. Even then the publishers did not withdraw, having reason to hope that the Sacred Congregation of Rites would enjoin the use of the new Gradual and Antiphonary on the faithful throughout Christendom.

Not finally rejecting the idea, the Congregation nevertheless hesitated to enforce conformity in this drastic way, though, on March 29, they were pressed into the admission that it was desirable all non-conformity should cease in the celebration of the offices; whereupon the publishers decided to proceed. But Igino made one excuse after the other for not delivering his father's manuscript, and eight months elapsed before it passed into the publishers' hands. The next step was to submit it to the Sacred Congregation of Rites, who imposed this condition on the publishers before giving a partial sanction to publication. Upon this Igino made an outcry, complaining that the Congregation were not competent to criticize his father's work. Suspicions were aroused. The manuscript was shown to experts who declared that the Sanctorale could not possibly be by Pierluigi, that it was full of mistakes and inaccuracies. Nor was this all. Thoroughly suspicious by this time of the whole transaction, the Sacred Congregation of Rites refused their permission for the appearance of the work. The publishers naturally withdrew from their contract with Igino and desired to return the manuscript which he refused to receive, demanding payment of the sum agreed on. The result was a lawsuit which dragged on interminably. In the end Igino could neither enforce payment, nor would he accept the return of the manuscript, which actually found its way to the Mont-de-piété where it still remained at Igino's death. It was only taken out in 1610 by order of Paul V., who gave it into the hands of Anerio and Soriano. They edited it as the Editio Medicæa, published in the year 1614. As may readily be imagined, this disagreeable affair put the Vatican thoroughly on their guard against Igino and if—as Bains states—the Pope seriously contemplated bringing out a complete edition of Pierluigi's works, he may well have hesitated before committing himself to dealings with the great composer's son. On Igino's side, he saw no great chances of profit, was in a very bad temper over the failure of his schemes, and in order to save himself expense in publishing, also possibly to annoy the Vatican, he sold the remainder of his father's manuscripts to two Venetians, Tiberio de Argentis and Andrea de Agnetis, who proceeded to edit volume after volume of hitherto unpublished masses; brought out with one exception by the Venetian house of Scoto, this remaining book receiving publication at the hands of Amadino of Venice. The works were arranged in the following order :—

Volume 8.—1599.

Quem dicunt homines ;
Dum esset summus pontifex ;
O admirable commercium (from the beautiful motet of that name) ;
Memor esto ;
Dum complerentur ; and Sacerdotes Domini.

Volume 9.—1599.

Ave Regina coelorum ;
Veni sponsa Christi ;
Vestiva i colli (based on Pierluigi's madrigal of the same name) ;
Sine nomine ;
In te Domine speravi ; and Te Deum laudamus.

Volume 10.—1600.

In illo tempore ;
Già fu chi m'vebbe cara ;
Petra sancta ;
O Virgo simil et mater ;
Quinti toni ; and Illumina oculos meos.

The last-mentioned mass, based on a theme taken from a motet composed by André de Silva, and which figures in a fanciful account of the rescue of Church music as related by Baini, had already appeared in the second edition of the seventh volume published by Coattino of Rome, under the title Ad bene placitum.

Volume 11.—1600.

Descendit Angelus Domini ;
Regina coeli ;
Quando lieta ;
Octavi toni ; and
Alma redemptoris.

Volume 12.

Regina coeli ;
O rex gloriæ ;
Ascendo ad patrem ;
Qual è il più gran' amor ;
Tu es Petrus ; and Viri Galilei.

The thirteenth volume contained four masses, the last of which had already been published. They were respectively :—

1601.

Laudate Dominum ; Hodie Christus natus est (both taken from motets with similar titles) ;
Fratres ego enim accepi ; and Confitebor.

Surely this long list of works waiting for publication must have weighed heavily on Pierluigi as his last hours ebbed. In spite of his great reputation, of the wide recognition of his genius, he knew that an immense number of his best compositions (far from being completed by this list) were at the mercy of circumstances—loss, neglect, or wilful destruction. “I have been a poor man all my life,” was true in this sense. What if he had housing, clothes, food, and to spare! These children of his brain were unhoused, unclothed, and he had to die leaving them so. He was probably aware of the deficiencies of his son and to what poor hands he was consigning his manuscripts. There is at least some cause for thankfulness that, in the result, it was no worse and that to the Venetians fell the credit of publishing such sublime and delightful works as Dum complerentur and O admirabile commercium. The four-part interlude in the Gloria of the former—Domine Fili unigenite Jesu Christe, Domine Deus, Agnus Dei, Filius Patris—is one of the most inspired moments in any of Pierluigi’s works and constitutes in itself a supreme act of worship; as if the angels themselves veiled their faces with their wings as they recited the titles of “the Lamb worthy to be slain.”

Let us now take leave of Iġino. The best that can be said for him is that he has not given his account of the matter; the worst, that he was the unworthy son of a great father. Yet, from the latter point of view, there seems a little incongruity in the close of his life, for it is related of him that, after losing his wife, he took orders and was made a canon of S. Agapito in his father's native town to which he retired for his remaining years. But he only enjoyed this position twenty-one days, dying in 1610. Of his children there is no further mention. The direct line of descendants came to an end in or after 1677.

CHAPTER XIII

(Concluding remarks)

AFTER the issue of the thirteenth volume of masses this wonderful stream of compositions was stemmed. It is true there was a reprint, in a mutilated form, of three masses in 1619 with subsequent re-edition until 1689; motets also, and hymns constantly reappeared, but until the advent of the great collected edition at the end of the last century no hitherto unpublished composition by Pierluigi saw the light. The Roman School was virtually dead and the signs of the times were there for all to read when it became possible to bring out arrangements of compositions originally a cappella with instrumental accompaniments. An accompaniment implies harmony. The chord became of paramount importance, that is, the sound combination formed by the organized contact of many voices. One of the first things a student of counterpoint is called upon to learn is to consider his melody or voice-part horizontally, while the student of harmony must regard his from a perpendicular point of view, each junction of the voices forming a dissonance or consonance which must be approached and quitted according to rule. The moment instruments were employed to accompany part-singing the perpendicular chord was all important, the strong and weak beat controlled the accents and a certain quality of indefiniteness which was as the very breath of the unaccompanied polyphonic school was gone for ever. Paradoxical as it may seem, modern music, while gaining in subtlety, colouring and weight, has lost in size. An unaccompanied six-part mass (obviously there is no restriction in the multiplication of voices) is practically immeasurable, for it is confined in no limit of rhythmic beat, thematic structure, or chromatic formula. Not that there is no beat, no structure, no key-scheme ; such a course would result in chaos ; but the beat is not limited by regularly recurring bar-lines, or the structure by fixed patterns—if the expression be allowed—of development. Again, the chromatic formula is that peculiar to the ecclesiastical modes, which, as already pointed out, differed fundamentally from our modern scale system and particularly as to the treatment of the “full close” or point of repose. The uniformity of timbre through the sole employment of the human voice, the absence of percussion, or of violent changes of any sort, create a certain atmosphere on which the spirit floats. To borrow a simile from architecture—it is unlikely that any one could enter the Pantheon in Rome without a sudden and startling sense of the vast space. Reflection alone reveals the art hidden in the cunning gradations of the enormous dome, the coffering of which directs the vision to the limitless vault beyond as seen through the circular opening in the centre. In other words, there is no apparent standard by which to gauge the proportions of the whole. In Pierluigi's music there is the same absence of a definite point of comparison by which to measure, and if the score be examined this seems even more remarkable, as nothing in the disposition of the voices would lead one to anticipate this quality of infinite space, this effect of divine freedom. There is something inexpressibly quietening in these "exquisite rhythms," for time and space fall away and with them the contemplation of earthly things. But appreciation of these heavenly chains of melody does not necessarily imply regret that the modern development of music took the course it did. Such a postulate would be merely ridiculous, for, as the sense of individual consciousness and responsibility grew, the selfless, passionless music of the Roman School ceased to express it. Actuality, at all events in some measure, can never be dispensed with if art is to be living.

Still, while conceding so much to modernity, it is a matter for regret that musicians have so often failed to perceive the innate divergence of religious and secular ideals. The Latin races, particularly, have sinned in this respect, and even to-day, in spite of a determined effort towards purification, it is possible to visit churches celebrated for the beauty of their music and to hear O salutaris hostia sung with exactly the same sentiment and colouring as would be suitable in a performance of the Preislid. And it may be added that ninety-nine people out of a hundred will murmur "how beautiful," and think they are listening to Church music. Yet, strange to say, at least fifty out of that hundred will readily perceive the exaggerations and distortions of sentiment in the post-renaissance schools of painting, the influences which killed, though very much more slowly, those qualities of self-restraint and physical quiescence which are necessary to a truly religious form of musical art. In this wide generalization it is impossible to particularize, or to consider the influence exercised by the masterpieces of Johann Sebastian Bach on Church music. The assertion that the element of dramatic expression, although confined to a stern and intellectual realism, nevertheless constituted a fall from those spheres of pure contemplation to which Pierluigi conducts us, should be substantiated by careful comparison of corresponding passages for which there is no opportunity here.

What the course of music in the West might have been if the influences of the Roman School had not been arrested by the instant and overwhelming success of opera may be surmised if the corresponding line of expansion be considered in Russia. The marvellous vitality and freedom from convention in that most interesting national school may be, in no small measure, attributed to the hold unaccompanied polyphony retained over the minds of the people. They passed from one musical formula to the other without experiencing successive stages. That is to say, when they, very much later in time, conceived the idea of writing opera, they brought to bear on it artistic experiences inspired by a true polyphonic tradition. It only became necessary to add the strongly-marked rhythms of their characteristic dances, and their school of national opera received its distinctive features. Such a result was only possible in a country where a national conservatism went hand in hand with a comparative isolation from western modes of thought and where a process of evolution was superseded, or very much curtailed, by a most remarkable intellectual intuition.* It may seem strange enough to those

* In Moscow and Petrograd there were choirs until recently whose singing alla cappella must have closely resembled the finest standard of sixteenth-century art brought up in the Classical and Romantic School created around the glorious names of musical literature, that so much insistence should be made on a more or less bygone form of art. To these the contention that anything has been lost in the supersession of ancient ideals by methods of chromatic development, thematic expansion, and psychological expression would be simply foolish. And there is nothing to cause astonishment in this point of view. The secrets of the great schools of painting, and the influence they exercised, may be sought for on the walls of a museum or art gallery, but the opportunities of making acquaintance with the masterpieces of a remote musical past are indeed few and far between. And it may safely be said that he who trusts to an instrument of percussion for the reproduction of these melodic chains will not be indisposed to say, "Let the dead past bury its dead," for it will be to him as a very valley of dead bones. The contrapuntal art may indeed astonish him, but the suavity, purity, and spirituality of invention cannot be conveyed by these means. Fortunately, if rare, there are other and better ways, as more and more attention is now being given to this ancient school, and in no capital of Europe may they be heard to better advantage than in London, in the appropriate atmosphere and spirit.*

* At Westminster Cathedral.

Although the Roman School was deposed from its great position by the overpowering craving for dramatic expression and ornament, it was inevitable that, sooner or later, an attempt should be made to reinstate it. Possibly the first to call the attention of his countrymen to the works of the school in general and of Pierluigi in particular, was Dr. Burney,* who writes in these unmistakable, if quaint, terms: "It is hoped that no apology will be necessary for the length of the article" (on the Roman School), "which the reader can make as short as he pleases. . . . In a general history of Ancient Poetry Homer would doubtless occupy the most ample and honourable place, and Palestrina, the Homer of the most Ancient Music that has been preserved, merits all the reverence and attention which it is in a musical historian's power to bestow." But Burney's voice was that of one, more or less, crying in the wilderness, for the world had grown indifferent and the psychological moment had not yet come. The century-glass turned once again and the Abbé Baini took up the burden, but he wrote for his countrymen and Northerners had no opportunity of hearing the works, which, to do him justice, he reproduced with so much zeal and enthusiasm in the services of the Sistine Chapel. The Englishman who arrived in Rome for Passion-week in his travelling-coach with courier and men-servants was not frequently the clay of which musicians are made, and even if he enjoyed a passion for the art, the idiom was coldly unfamiliar. With the rich, warm, floritura and Southern fire of the operatic singer most in vogue at the moment ringing in his ears, what was he likely to make of a form of music for which pre-eminently one must possess the "ear to hear"? Then the Germans intervened, primarily from a sense of the degradation into which ecclesiastical music had fallen; for no one who had studied the history of Church music could fail to perceive that the abuses complained of by the Council of Trent were almost all common features of the day. Dr. Karl Proske, priest and scholar, devoted himself to its purification, and very wisely went to the source from whence the waters flowed crystal clear; for which reason his tombstone records him as Musicae divinae restaurator ingeniosissimus. In the prosecution of this intention he visited Rome in the year 1834, and the diary of this journey constitutes one of the most interesting accounts extant of the state of Church music at that time. On November 1, 3, and 4 respectively, he heard a performance in the Sistine Chapel of Pierluigi's Missa Brevis and Requiem, in S. Carlo al Corso, his Aeterna Christi munera, serving to show that Baini, still active though already in ill-health, had succeeded to some extent in reinstating the works of the Musicae Princeps. But the difficulties experienced by Proske in fulfilling his object—that of cataloguing the unpublished works of the great period—were well-nigh prohibitive. Jealous suspicion alternated with crass indifference, forming an almost insuperable barrier. With patience and tact he partially overcame his difficulties. His catalogue reveals, under the circumstances, a triumphant result, containing as it does the whole of the masses contained in the 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, and 22 volumes of the Breitkopf and Härtel edition, as well as a miscellaneous collection of smaller works constituting in themselves a formidable achievement. Thus the way was marked out and followed by such men as Dr. Franz Xaver Witt, the founder of the Society of St. Cecilia, Espagne, Theodore de Witt, Franz Commer, Bauerle, and last, but not least, by Haberl. He it was who gathered up the labours of his forerunners into the gigantic enterprise of a collected edition completed on the three hundredth anniversary of the great musician's death, with the co-operation of subscribers in England, France, Holland, Austria, Germany, and Italy. This naturally dwarfs all other efforts, such as those of Choron and the Prince of la Moskowa, or of the yet more important services of the Choir of St. Gervais in Paris, the Bach Choir, and other societies in England. The celebrations in connection with the tri-centenary all over the world, and notably in Rome, helped to advertise the revival, and since that time a growing interest has been quickened by the motu proprio of Pius X., issued on November 22, 1903, who, in this document, insisted on a return to the plainsong melodies of the Primitive Church coupled with those works of the Roman School that "agree so well with it." * But the obstacles are still many. The Israelites could not make bricks without straw, and the churches cannot produce choirs capable of coping with the difficulties of alla cappella singing without money, which means good training and good voices. Very considerable spade-work remains before those interested in restoring this great beauty to the churches at large. It is not, indeed, only a matter of money but of education, and that is perhaps the hardest part of all.

* Burney published in his "History of Music" the celebrated Stabat Mater, the Improperia, and the motet Fratres ego enim accepi.

* It should perhaps be mentioned that the ultimate results of Pius X.'s motu proprio was to discredit the whole of the Ratisbon publications in favour of the purer art of Solesmes; but this only refers to plainsong.

CHAPTER XIV

AN allusion was made in the preceding chapter to the tri-centenary festival in 1894. In 1914 a curious scheme was set on foot in Palestrina to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the great townsman's birth, thus postulating its occurrence in 1514.* In the opening chapters dealing with the early life it was considered inadvisable to check the flow of the narrative at that point with an inquiry into the various dates assigned by different authors to this interesting fact, but it is obvious that no book pretending to deal with Pierluigi's history can afford to ignore the controversy which rages round this question. The statement was made that he was born towards the end of 1525, but the dates given by the best known authorities range from 1514 to 1529. The first of these has still many adherents, particularly in Palestrina where it has attained to the force of a tradition—

* A statue was unveiled there in October, 1921.

hence the project just referred to. It is founded on the inscription discovered on that portrait of Pierluigi formerly in the Quirinal, now in the Sixtine Chapel. This runs: Joannes Petrus Aloysius Praenestinus Musicae Princeps, sub Julio III. prius cantor, mox sub Pio IV., modulator pontificius, lateranae et liberianae, demum bis vaticanae basilicae capellae magister. Obiit IV. Idus Februarii MDXCIV. vixit prope octogenarius; sepultus est sub Sacello vaticano St. Simonis et Judae.* This is authoritative enough; but it has now been established that the handwriting is later in date than the portrait, corroborated by the circumstance that it was unknown to Andrea Adami, writing in 1711. But until this fact was discovered, the inscription was regarded as authoritative, coinciding, as it did, with the statement made by Iginio in the dedication of the seventh book of masses to Clement VIII.: Joannes Petralloysius pater meus septuaginta fere vitae suae annos in Dei laudibus componendi consumens. . . .† It was pointed out that Pierluigi probably went into the choir of St. Agapito at the age of ten, thus entering on the service of "nearly seventy years" to which Iginio refers. On the other hand, Baini took Iginio's statement literally, even the qualifying

* "... He lived to be nearly eighty." The rest of the inscription is taken up with his various appointments, etc., etc.

† Giovanni Pierluigi, my father, spent nearly seventy years of his life in composing to God's praise.

fere receiving scant attention. Thus, seventy years subtracted from 1594 left the date 1524; so Pierluigi was, on the evidence of his son, indubitably born in 1524. Round these central positions most biographers ranged themselves, though yet others selected the year 1520—based on the ground of certain Memorie incerte deposited by Baini in the archives of the Sixtine Chapel after the publication in 1826 of his Memorie storicocritiche della vita e delle opere di Giovanni da Palestrina, or 1529, the date chosen by Adami, who as the oldest writer on Pierluigi was supposed to be the most reliable. Haberl himself accepted the date 1514 after investigations he was able to make on the spot (in Palestrina), but was first shaken, then convinced, this time irrevocably, by finding another inscription on the last sheet of the tenor-part in a volume of French masses. Written in an educated hand was the following: . . . Cum igitur hec omnia Musicae munera nemo his temporibus melius Prenestino nostro prestiterit, Iure optimo Musicae parentem ut homerum poeticae possumus nominare. Moritur mense februarij die purificationis beate Mariae virginis Anno virginei partus 1594. Sedente Clemente P.P. VIII. Fuit sepultus in dicta Basilica maxima cum pompa funerali et magna cantorum comitante caterva et qui vidit hec scripsit Melchior major. Vixit annis LXVIJ.

Ut re mi fa sol la ascendunt, sic peruia coelos
Transcendit volitans nomen ad astra tuum (o Prenestine).

O mors inevitabilis, mors amara et improba, mors crudelis, que templa dulcibus sonis privas et aulas principum, Prenestinum dum necasti, illum nobis abstulisti, qui suam per armoniam illustravit ecclesiam; Propterea tu Musicae dic requiescat in pace. Melchioris sum.*

Thus, for the first time, a definite statement was made by a contemporary which corroborated the figurative sentence in Igino's dedication, for the latter was not meant to be taken literally; it was a poetic statement, approximately true, such as is often made in similar cases.

At first Dr. Haberl scarcely seems to have realized the importance of his find. Who, then, was Melchior?† On what grounds should his statement be accepted as final? Dr. Haberl spent two years over the uncertainty. But the

* Which, freely translated, runs—

Therefore, as our Palestrina was before all others in our times in the display of all these gifts of music he may truly be called the Father of Music, as was Homer of Poetry. He died in the month of February, on the Purification of the B. V. Mary, A.D. 1594, in the reign of Clement VIII., and was buried in the aforementioned great basilica (St. Peter's) with funeral pomp and accompanied by a great body of singers, as he who writes this, Melchior Major, witnessed.

Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la ascends, and in like manner
Rises thy name to the stars, O Palestrinian.

O miserable Death, Death bitter and horrible, cruel Death, who robbeth the temples and the halls of the princes of such sweet sounds in slaying Palestrina, thou hast also taken from us one who glorified the Church by his harmony, therefore bid music, rest in peace.

internal evidence was too strong. It had everything in its favour; Pierluigi's extraordinary intellectual vigour between the years 1584 and 1594—astonishing enough in a man of sixty to seventy, almost incredible in a man of seventy to eighty; his willingness to abandon Rome for the service of the Duke of Mantua—an improbable decision had he been in reality over seventy, but by no means unusual at sixty; even the fact of his remarriage—the step being much more natural at sixty than at seventy,—all these circumstances corroborate the accuracy of the date. But certainly the strongest link in the chain of evidence is afforded by the fact that Pierluigi's first published madrigal, Con dolce altiera, was dated 1554. If born in 1514 he was already forty at the time! Surely that speaks for itself? These and yet other considerations caused Haberl to reconsider his position, and in 1888 he wrote: * "Our eye-witness (Melchior major †) has given trustworthy proof of Palestrina's age and, consequently, for the year of the Roman master's birth: not in 1514 but in 1526 is it my well-grounded conviction that Palestrina was born."

This testimony was considered final, all subsequent writers following Haberl's lead. But a new pamphlet cuts the matter still finer.* There it is pointed out that Melchior stated Pierluigi's age on the day of his death to be sixty-eight. In that case he was sixty-eight. If, then, his birthday did not happen to fall in January he was already sixty-eight in the year 1593, in which case 68 subtracted from 1594 left the date of his birth 1525, not 6. The difference, it is true, is not great, but it is a practical emendation, so much so that in future it will be necessary to give the great Palestrinian's birth as "between the years 1525 and 1526."

* Haberl, F. X., Bibliographischer und thematischer Musik-katalog. 1888.

† Haberl made a slip and wrote it Mafor instead of Major.

In connection with this inquiry the following curious story may not be without interest. It was related to the present writer by a prominent biographer and fellow-townsmen of Pierluigi. He discovered, during some research work, a manuscript in a certain Augustinian monastery which he considered, on a hasty inspection, to be highly important; in particular, bearing on the burning question of Pierluigi's birth-date. As it was very difficult to decipher, and as he was unable at the moment to give it the attention it undoubtedly deserved, he left it on that day, but lost no time in writing to the monastery for permission to have the document photographed. Unfortunately, between the request and the subsequent permission the manuscript had disappeared. Some one, following hard on this student's heels, had likewise gauged the extreme importance of the discovery, and, less scrupulous, quietly put the MS. in his pocket without troubling about the formality of asking. This was in 1912, and it may be that the events which filled the ensuing years are alone responsible for the circumstance that the world is still in doubt—or at least in conflict—as to the year of Pierluigi's birth.

However this may be, the enormous output achieved by the Master—were his life ten years longer than Melchior Major has given posterity reason to believe—would still remain amazing. Ninety-three masses, two hundred and fifty-six motets,* four books of madrigals, not counting the hymns and offertories for the whole of the Church year, the three books of Magnificats, the same number of Litanies, of Lamentations; two books of Madrigali Spirituali, constitute a formidable list and prove Pierluigi to have been an extraordinarily hard worker. Assuredly they were not all on the same grand level of inspiration, how should they be? which is, after all, only another way of saying that Pierluigi was human. Some of the compositions were “sur commande,” others contrapuntal tours de force.

* Including one or two doubtful or wrongly attributed.

Nevertheless, the number of masterpieces is marvellously high. Bains distinguishes—with more ingenuity than usefulness—eight styles or genres of composition in the Master's art which he proceeds to subdivide into yet others : for instance, a first epoch in which Pierluigi was not yet freed from his Netherlandish fetters ; a second while under the influence of Festa and the post-Josquin School ; a third dominated by Morales and the Spaniards. In the fourth Bains pronounces him to have found himself—and so on, and so forth. It may be questioned whether such arbitrary landmarks in the life of a great man serve any useful purpose. A more fruitful study would possibly be an inquiry into the different founts of expression—if the term be permitted—to which he went for his inspiration. As it was customary to compose the six sections of a mass on one theme, or different sections of one theme, it was a matter of extreme importance to find one that lent itself to a characteristic and suitable treatment. It has already been pointed out more than once in the foregoing pages what these themes usually were, and to a limited extent the choice determined the particular treatment accorded to the composition. Thus, if the theme were more or less secular in character it was often (though certainly not always) the occasion for a most elaborate contrapuntal exhibition in which Pierluigi delighted to show his extraordinary mastery of the material. Instances of this are afforded by the masses Ecce Sacerdos Magnus, L'homme armé, and Ad fugam. Taken from a Gregorian melody it often received a devout, inspired yet ceremonial impress in keeping with its sacerdotal origin. In the masses of greater scope, such as Ecce ego Joannes or Dum complerentur, the invariable strength of phrase and intensity of expression are in direct contrast with some of the smaller though equally beautiful works, such as Aeterna Christi munera, Iste Confessor, and Missa brevis, in which the musical phrase is shorter, more defined, and simpler in design; or such works as Assumpta est Maria and the motets on the Song of Solomon display a quality more emotional, more direct, more personal. If Pierluigi selected a theme with strong Church associations he did not need so much to consider the form in which he should work on the imagination of his hearers as to enrich the texture by the reiteration of chosen phrases treated canonically. Examine the mass Iste Confessor, constructed on the Vesper hymn of that name, and it will be seen that in the first section of fourteen bars* there are no less than seven entries of the initial phrase of the hymn; in the second, of fifteen bars, there are nine entries of the second phrase of the theme; and in the third section of fourteen bars, there are eight entries of the third phrase of the theme. Thus, in a composition comprising forty-three bars, Pierluigi employs three sections of his theme no less than thirty-four times. This is certainly an instance of close weaving, and it might have been expected that the result would be a strained and stilted work as "cribbed, cabined, and confined" as some Byzantine Madonna of the late period when measurements restricted the artist's imagination within iron limits and forced him to conform. Yet the Kyrie flows with inimitable suavity from start to finish, nor does the ear detect the constant reiteration of a given phrase. The art—the wonderful art of it! It is like some marvellous piece of needlework, of web-like pattern, gleaming with gold, silver, and soft colours, obeying the hidden law of the design, but presenting an indefinite yet gorgeous whole. The eye endeavours to distinguish the course of one thread, only to be deflected by another. It receives no exact impression, but the vague perception it conveys to the brain is of an agreeable harmonious whole, rising to sensations of acute pleasure. This simile, however, fails in one important aspect. No general perception of colour could affect the mind so powerfully as sound, or produce the same moral effect. Pierluigi's music penetrates the depths of the soul, and its selflessness widens the conception of things appertaining to the spirit. More, far more than a new formula of art, it was founded on antiquity and built up on international inspiration. It was the consecration of sound, or to recall S. Filippo's admirable phrase for the last time, the contemplation of celestial things by means of heavenly harmonies.

It may be that the years will see a return to the ideals of unaccompanied polyphony ; there are many beautiful secrets there for the finding.* But first it is necessary to train those ears to hear, which, like the eyes to see, are indispensable for the contemplation of all things, celestial or otherwise ; in other words, the inner vision.

* Such seem already to have inspired Hans Pfitzner since the above sentence was written, whose opera Palestrina is so described : "Ein Werk von so reiner Gesinnung und einem so erhabenen Ernste, der dem Idealismus seines Schöpfers das Opfer einer Selbstverleugung ohne jeden Seitenblick auf die Güter dieser Welt auferlegt . . . wird nie die Huld der Masse finden," etc.
